THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers.
NUMBER NINETY-EIGHT CHESNUT ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

ONE DOLLAR per annum when taken in Clubs of 20, and a paper gratis to the person getting up the Club.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXVII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1848. WHOLE NO. 1400.

Choice Poetry.

REVISED POEMS,

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

WANTED—A THEME.

The spring is here again, mother, she bursts upon our sight,
Like a young girl in her bridal dress, all bloom and love and light:
The birds from out the sunny south, Heaven-guided, hither come,
And earth is very fair, mother, far round our cottage home.

A spell is on my heart, mother, a deep, mysterious spell—
I feel the mighty tide of song within my spirit swell!
Then God for one a theme, mother, a theme to write upon,
Ere breaks that spell, and ere that tide has ebbed away and gone.

I could write of the fields, mother, the dark and waving woods,
The leaping flowers, the clinging vines, the waterfalls and floods;
Hilt then the world would say, mother, although I was done up neat,
That I was in a beaten track, a-following that Street.

I might weave lays like rose-wreaths, mother, and fling them left and right,
All coloured with the breath of love, and glowing with its light;
But though I were all a dream, mother, wise ones their heads would shake,
And they'd say I was in love, mother—which were a sad mistake.

I could write of the West, mother—tell many a backwoods's tale;
But Mary Clavers long ago chanced on that happy trail.
And went it "with a rush," mother, as all the world agree,
And made a "powerful sight" of fun, and left us laugh for one.

I could write on the wars, mother, the soldier's glorious life,
I sometimes think it is my fate to sing of scenes of strife;
But I've avowed peace principles, and may not call them back;
So I cannot write of war, mother—I must take another tack.

The terrible might do, mother, some wild, unearthly story,
I might ride for a Pegasus, a nightmare into glory;
But then, that "Raven" there, mother, above that "chamber-door,"
I asked him if I would be a hit—"Quoth the raven, never more!"

I might plead for the poor, mother, the wronged and the oppressed,
And give a flash of freedom's fire, deep burning in my breast;
But they'd say I was a fanatic, a-battling with weak straws
Against the mighty Union, and the Almighty Laws.

The feelings of the beau-monde, mother, should I write on as I feel,
The ladies fair would vote me odd, and not at all genteel;
And ah, the lordly sex, mother, they are would hence not fail,
They'd say I was a sour old maid—and that were worse than all!

I think I'll off to bed, mother—I'm tired, and then it's late;
The scene I rode this afternoon had such a shocking gait.
So, do not early break, mother, my deep and soft repose,
For I love a morning date, mother, I love a morning date!

Original Tales.

THE GAME OF CHESS.

A LEGEND OF SPAIN.

TRANSLATED FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY MRS. ST. SIMON.

CHAPTER I.

THE REVERIES.

King Philip II. was playing at chess in the palace of the Escurial. Ruy Lopez, a hitherto obscure priest, who was an adept at the game, was his majesty's antagonist. As a particular favor the great player was allowed to kneel upon a cushion of rich velvet, while the grandees of the court stood around the King, in an attitude of sadness and anxiety.

The morning was clear, and odorous as the breeze which sighs over the orange groves of Grenada; the sun cast his rays of fire upon the window panes, but the purple curtains of the splendid hall tempered his scorching heat. The brightness of the day, however, did not seem in harmony with the gloomy reserve of the King. His brow was contracted; from time to time the thoughts which occupied his bosom could be seen passing like shadows across its furrowed surface. His forehead was dark as the tempest which bursts over the summit of the Alpujarras. From beneath his frowning brows the King looked often toward the door of entrance; the nobles who surrounded him stood silent, and exchanged significant glances the aspect of this group was cold and serious; it was evident that some momentous event weighed upon all present. The game attracted the attention of no one, unless perhaps that of Ruy Lopez, who hesitated as he reflected seriously between a forced mate, and the deference due to his Catholic Majesty, Philip II., Sovereign of all Spain and its dependencies.

The silence was unbroken; no sound was heard but that caused by the players as they moved their pieces when, suddenly, the door was thrown open. A man of rich and elegant appearance presented himself in mute humility before the King, awaiting his orders to speak. The exterior of this man was far from prepossessing; a hasty and general movement took place at his entrance; the lords shrank from him in disdain, as they crossed with disgust, as they would have recoiled at the sudden appearance of some animal at once dangerous and loathsome. His frame was broad and square, and seemed endowed with almost herculean strength; he was clothed in a doublet of black leather; vulgar features, destitute of the slightest signs of intellect, betokened him a man of brutal tastes and passions; a large and deep scar beginning at the eyebrow, and losing itself beneath his chin in a tuft of beard, gave additional hardiness to his visage. His stature seemed equally made up of the man and the brute.

Philip II. opened his lips; his voice trembled; he was violently agitated; an electric thrill pervaded the assembly. For this new comer, this strange man, endowed with naught but physical strength, but this in all its power, was Fernando Calavar, the chief executioner of Spain.

"Is he dead?" inquired Philip, in an imperious tone, which while it broke the fearful silence, chilled everyone with terror.

"No, sire," replied Fernando Calavar, bowing low.

The King's brows were contracted.

"As a grandee of Spain, the condemned has claimed his privileges, and I could not proceed against a man of the noblest blood in the kingdom, without a more precise order from your majesty."

He bowed low once more.

A murmur of approbation ran through the assembly; it was the response of the nobles who had listened with extreme attention. The blood of Castile boiled in their veins, and colored their cheeks. This manifestation of interest became general. Young Alphonso d'Ocana was the first to give it avowing and signifying by placing upon his head his hat of ceremony. His example was boldly followed by the greater part of the nobles present. The waving of their tall white plumes seemed to proclaim that those who wore them protested in behalf of their privileges, by thus exercising that one which gave to the grandees of Spain the right to cover their heads in presence of their sovereign.

A movement of suppressed anger escaped the King; he struck the table violently with his right hand, disturbing the pieces upon the board.

"He has been judged by our royal council," he said, "judged and condemned to death. What does he demand, then, this traitor?"

"Sire," answered the executioner, "he demands to die by the axe and the block; he demands also to pass the three last hours of his life with a priest."

"He!—tis granted," replied the King, in a tone of satisfaction. "It not our confessor with him as we command?"

"Yes, sire," said Fernando, "the holy man is with him, but the Duke will not listen to Don Diaz de Silva. He will receive absolution from no one beneath a bishop, such being the privilege of a noble condemned to death for high treason."

"Such are our rights," cried the heedless Ocuna, "and we claim our privileges from the King in behalf of our cousin."

These words were the signal for general remonstrance.

"Our rights and the King's justice are inseparable," said Don Diego de Tarraxa, Count of Valencia, an old man of gigantic stature who was clothed in armor, and, holding in his hand the baton of the high constable of Spain, stood leaning upon his long Toledo sword.

"Our rights and our privileges!" cried the assembled nobles.

These bold words, repeated like an echo, caused the King to start upon his throne of ebony.

"By the bones of Campeador," he exclaimed, "by the soul of St. Jago, I have sworn neither to eat nor drink until the bloody head of the traitor, Don Guzmon, has been brought to me, until I have seen it with mine own eyes! It shall be done as I have sworn. But Don Tarraxa has said well. The justice of the King confirms the rights of his subjects. My lord constable, where dwells our learnt bishop?"

"Sire, my dealings are offener with the camp than with the church. Your majesty's almoner, Don Silvas, here present, will tell you better than I can."

"Sire," said Don Silvas y Mendez, humbly, and with a tremulous voice, "the Bishop of Segovia belongs to the King's household; but he who filled this office died last week, and the fiat which appoints his successor, is still upon the table of the council, and must receive the sanction of the Pope. There is an assembly of the Princes of the Church at Valladolid; all the bishops are to be there.—The Bishop of Madrid left his palace yesterday to repair thither."

At these words a smile of joy played upon the lips of Ocanna. This joy was very natural, for the young man was allied to the family of Don Guzmon, and the condemned, his cousin, was his nearest friend.

The King remarked this smile; his eye then assumed a different expression; an expression of impatience and irritation.

"We are a crowned King," he said gravely, and with the calmness which precedes a storm. "Our royal person should not serve as a target for raillery. The sceptre seems light, my lords, but he who is so imprudent as to smile thereat, will be crushed by it as by a hammer of iron! Besides, our holy father, the Pope, is somewhat in our debt, and we do not fear his disapproval in the step which we are about to take. Since the King of Spain can make a Prince, why, certes, he can make a bishop. Rise, then, Don Ruy Lopez! I name thee Bishop of Segovia. Stand up, sir priest! I command thee! take thy rank in the church."

Universal astonishment followed these words.

Don Ruy Lopez rose mechanically; he hesitated; he endeavored to speak.

"May it please your majesty," he said.

"Silence, my lord bishop!" cried the King.—"Obey thy sovereign. The ceremony of thy installation shall be performed at some future day.—our subjects will not fail to recognize our will in this affair. Bishop of Segovia, repair with Calavar to the cell of the criminal. Purify his soul from sin, and in the space of three hours deliver over his body to the axe of the headsman. As for thee, Calavar, we will await thee in this hall; thou wilt bring hither the head of the traitor, for Don Guzman, Prince of Calatrava, Duke of Medina Sidonia, shall die this day. Let our sentence be executed!"

The King now approached Ruy Lopez.

"I give thee my signet ring," he said, "that the Duke may credit thy words. Well, my lords," he added, "do you still venture to doubt the justice of your King?"

No one replied. Ruy Lopez followed the headsman, and the King having resumed his seat, signed to one of his favorites to take his place opposite to him at the chess board. Don Ramirez, Count of Biscay, approached, and kneeled upon the velvet cushion.

"With chess, my lords," said the King, smiling, "and with your company, the interval will pass pleasantly. Let no one leave the apartment until the return of Calavar. We might find the time wearisome if one of you were absent."

With these words of irony, Philip commenced a new game with Don Ramirez, and the nobles, overcome with fatigue, stood in a group around the players, as at the commencement of this narrative.

The scene resumed its former order and calmness, while Calavar conducted the new bishop to the dungeon of the criminal.

Ruy Lopez walked onward with downcast eyes; a spectator would have taken him for a condemned criminal. His brain reeled; all that had passed seemed like a trick of the imagination—he scarcely knew whether he were awake or dreaming. In the bottom of his heart he cursed both the King and the Court. At times, indeed, he recalled to mind that he was Bishop of Segovia, but a pang entered his soul as he thought upon the price at which this dignity was purchased. What had Don Guzman done to him that he should thus contribute to his destruction. Such were his reflections as he paced the marble pavement which led to the prisons of state, and he prayed God that the earth might open and swallow him alive. His prayer was uttered in obscurity, but it was uttered in vain.

CHAPTER II.

THE DUNGEON.

The Prince of Calatrava, confined in a narrow wainscotted chamber, was pacing his cell with hurried, irregular step, that betokened keen anxiety. The apartment was furnished with a massive table, and two heavy wooden stools; the floor was covered with coarse thick matting; here every sound was smothered; silence reigned supreme. A rudely carved crucifix was fastened against the wall, in the recess of the arched window which admitted light into the apartment. Except this symbol of resignation and compassion nothing adorned the walls of this cold and gloomy cell; it might be called the vestibule of death, the ante-chamber of the tomb. The window was at a great height from the ground, and carefully furnished with iron bars. No precaution was wanting for the safe keeping of the prisoner.

At the moment when Ruy Lopez presented himself before the noble Duke, the rays of the sun poured brightly into the chamber of the condemned; they seemed to smile in irony upon him who looked for the last time upon the light of day.

The Duke saluted the new father of the church with more than usual courtliness; each gazed at the other, and in that gaze they exchanged a thousand words which they alone could comprehend. Ruy Lopez felt all the painfulness of his errand, and the Duke divined his embarrassment; some thought entered the mind of each as their eyes met; the thought that by this sentence which condemned to death one of the chief favorites of the King, the life of an innocent man was cancelled. Still worldly pride had been brought forward of the crime imputed to the Duke; one, above all—a despatch written in his own hand to the Court of France, in which he revealed a project to assassinate King Philip II. It was this which had led to his condemnation. Besides this, Don Guzman, confiding in his innocence, had kept perfect silence before his judges, and the accusation being unrepelled, the doom of a traitor had been pronounced against him. As he listened to the sentence Don Guzman had cast turned pale, not a feature was agitated, he had faced the storm, he had braved death. Even this last hour had no terrors for him, and he listened coolly to the summons, which called him hence, with its harsh and pitiless voice. If his brow darkened, if his step was hurried, his breathing irregular, it was that he thought upon his affianced bride, Donna Estella, who, ignorant of his condemnation, was awaiting his return in her castellated mansion on the banks of the Guadalquivir. If he was weak at this fatal moment, it was that love appeared to him in a dreamy reverie, and his throbbing heart banished the remembrance of all except her whose image he cherished so fondly in his bosom.

Don Ruy Lopez had not entered alone. Calavar was at his side, and it was he who first spoke to inform the Duke of the King's reply to his request, and the resolution which his majesty had formed. Ruy Lopez confirmed the headsman's words, and Don Guzman listened with fervent deference before the new bishop, and asked for his blessing. He then calmly turned to Calavar, and with a commanding gesture he dismissed him, saying:

"Is three hours I am thine?"

Calavar obeyed.

The Duke and the bishop now found themselves face to face. Don Ruy Lopez trembled; the features of Don Guzman had become calm and serene. He took the bishop's hand, and pressed it warmly. After a short pause the Duke spoke:

"We have met under happier auspices," he said, almost with a smile.

"It is true," stammered Ruy Lopez, who, pale and fearful, resembled a condemned culprit rather than a confessor.

"Far happier," reiterated the Duke, as if in a reverie, and yielding to past remembrances. "Have you forgotten that when you played your great game with Paoli Boy, the Sicilian, in the presence of Philip and the Court, it was upon my right arm that his majesty leaned?"

Softened by these recollections, and by the sad tone with which the Duke recalled them, Ruy Lopez endeavored to control his emotion, and replied:

"These regrets are vain, my dear son; do not waste your time in idle words; employ it rather in making your peace with Heaven, since Heaven vouchsafes to listen to you. Let us read together the holy office, that your soul may be cleansed from its stains, and that you may be prepared for the last change."

"A change, in truth," exclaimed the Duke, with a smile at this exhortation. "Yes, father, my father, these words of Miguel Cervantes, words very suitable for you to utter, and for me to hear; I left a ace of chess! I forget the precise place in which the passage is to be found, but its meaning is, that everywhere upon the earth men play different parts. In life, as in chess, there are kings, knights, bishops and pawns, according to fate, fortune and birth, and when the game is finished, death enters upon the scene, and levels all distinctions, as one replaces the pieces in the box."

"I remember those words of Don Quixote," replied Don Ruy, extremely alarmed at this singular mask, "and I remember, also, Sancho's reply; 'That however just the comparison, it was not on some hot that it had been heard before.' But let us cease this levity, my son!"

"Still, I have been your favorite pupil, nay, even your antagonist," said the Duke, without appearing to listen to Don Ruy Lopez.

"It is true," replied the bishop, "you are a master of the game, and I have often boasted of my pupil. But kneel, my son."

Both kneeled; and before the crucifix, at the foot of the Redeemer's image, Don Guzman confessed his sins to Ruy Lopez, who listened to him with tears. Then, when the Duke had ended, that is to say, after the space of two hours, for the confession which had been buried beneath the seal of the church, was long and moving, the bishop blessed the prisoner, and gave him absolution.

They then rose; the features of Don Guzman were calm and resigned. There remained yet an hour to wait.

"This delay is frightful," exclaimed the Duke. "Why not end at once the life of a doomed man? Since the world and I are severed from each other, why leave me thus? An eternity of suffering is comprised in each moment of this suspense. And the headsman still lingers!"

The condemned walked back and forth in his cell; his eye, directed towards the door, seemed to summon Calavar and his assistants; the trial was terrible; the Duke's firmness, which would have been proof beneath the axe, faltered in this hour of suspense.

Ruy Lopez had accomplished his mission. He had still an hour to pass with the prisoner of state, but his exhortations were ended; the soul of the condemned was purified, the priest had become the man again. At the exclamation uttered by Don Guzman, and remarking the pallor of his features, he saw that his firm soul was sinking beneath the thoughts which racked his bosom, and that the hour which yet remained would perhaps unnerve him for the last and fatal moment. He pondered upon the means to divert the Duke from self-reflection; his agitated mind could find none. What solace could he offer to a man so soon to die? For one condemned, the flower no longer has its perfume, woman no longer has her smile. The good bishop pondered for awhile in vain, when a sudden thought darted across his mind.

"If a game of chess were not too profane?" he said, timidly.

"The idea is excellent!" cried Don Guzman, recalled to earth again by this singular proposal. "Sage bishop, the idea is brilliant. A farewell game at chess!"

"Do you consent?"

"But the pieces, my good friend?"

"De I not always bear about me the instruments of self-exile?" said Ruy Lopez, with a smile. He then drew forward the two stools, and arranged a miniature set of chess-men upon the table. "Our Lady pardon me," he added, "but I sometimes amuse myself in studying a problem in the confessional."

"Many problems are solved there, doubtless," replied the Duke, smiling.

The pieces were arranged; the players took their seats, and these two lords, the one spiritual, the other temporal, were soon absorbed in the mysterious game.

It was a curious spectacle, and one worthy the skilful pencil of a Rembrandt or a Salvator Rosa—that strange game between the priest and the criminal. A faint light shone upon the pale and noble features of Don Guzman, and the rays which entered at the lofty window, fell full upon the benevolent visage of Ruy Lopez, who, as he played, wiped stealthily away the tears which compassion forced from his eyes.

The emotions which agitated the two antagonists were very different. Ruy Lopez played with a heedlessness and an absence of mind, which was far from being usual to him, and which deprived him of his accustomed skill. Don Guzman, on the contrary, displayed all the energies of genius of the human soul, stimulated by the ardor which devoured him, conducted his game with extraordinary dexterity and forethought. In this trying moment the blood of Castile did not fail him, for never had the Duke evinced more clearness of intellect, more depth of calculation. This presence of mind might be compared to the last blaze of an expiring lamp, to the last harmonious strains of a dying swan. The noble peer seemed, in truth, elevated above the earth and free from every thought of despondency; he appeared already to have attained that state of spiritual essence to which the axe of the headsman was soon about to transmute him.

Don Guzman had attacked his adversary with an impetuosity which soon rendered his victory almost certain. Ruy Lopez forgetting, involuntarily, as it were, his sad reflections, defended himself stoutly; but all his skill was fruitless. The game had become more and more complicated. The bishop was endeavoring to arrive at a mate, that was inevitable, indeed, but still distant, and Don Guzman pursued his advantage with the ardor inspired by approaching success. The world was forgotten; the moments flew unheeded; his mistress was the chess board; a lifetime seemed to pass in each single move! Happy illusion! if Heaven had but permitted it to last!

But no! the minutes are told, and the fatal hour has arrived!

A distant sound is heard; it approaches; it grows more distinct; the door of the cell turns upon its triple hinges of iron; and the Duke is aroused from his game and his dreams of victory, by the cold and terrible reality which appears before him in the features of the headsman.

The executioner, followed by holding torches, and armed with swords, advanced, bearing a block covered with black cloth, the purpose of which was announced with sufficient clearness by the axe which was laid upon it. They placed their torches in the bracket prepared for them, while one of their number strewed the floor of the cell with the dust of cedar wood. All this was accomplished in a moment; they waited only for the condemned. Ruy Lopez rose trembling at the sight of Calavar, but the Duke did not move. He remained, with his eyes fixed upon the chess board, without heeding either the executioners or the block.

It was Don Guzman's turn to play.

Calavar, seeing him then motionless, placed his hand upon the Duke's shoulder, and uttered but a single word; but this word was a summons to death.

"Come!" he said.

The prisoner started as if he had trodden upon a serpent.

"Let me finish the game!" he said, imperiously.

"It is impossible!" replied Calavar.

"Why, knave, I have won it! I have a forced mate, most certainly. Let me play out the game!"

"It is impossible!" repeated the headsman.

"The three hours—are they passed?"

"The last strokes have sounded. We must obey the orders of the King.

The assistants who had stood near, leaning upon their swords, advanced at these words.

The Duke was seated against the wall below the narrow window. Thus, the table was placed between him and Calavar. He rose and said in a commanding tone:

"Let this game! my head then shall have attorneys. I will not stir until it is finished. I shall need half an hour; wait then!"

"My lord Duke," replied Calavar, "I respect and honor you, but I cannot grant this delay. It would cost me my head."

Don Guzman made a movement of impatience, then removing the diamonds which he wore upon his fingers, he cast them calmly at the hangman's feet.

"I will finish the game," he said, coolly.

The jewels rolled upon the floor, and lay untouched amid the dust. The executioners gazed upon each other in astonishment.

"My orders are precise," replied Calavar, imperiously. "I crave your pardon, noble Duke, if I cannot be violence to the King's law, and the law of Spain must be enforced. Leave your place then, and waste not your last moments in a useless struggle. Speak to the Duke, my lord Bishop! Counsel him to submit to his fate."

The answer of Ruy Lopez was prompt and decisive.

He seized the axe which lay upon the block, and brandishing it about his head, he cried:

"Pax! I enfier! The Duke shall finish his game!"

Terrified at the gesture which accompanied these words, Calavar recoiled, and almost fell into the arms of his acolytes. Swords were raised, and the sanguinary band prepared themselves for the conflict. But Ruy Lopez, who seemed transformed into a Hercules, cast his heavy oaken stool upon the floor, and cried in a voice of thunder:

"The first who passes this limit fired by the church, is a dead man! Courage, noble Duke! To the work, then! there are but four of these miscreants. Your lordship's last hour shall be granted, were it at the hazard of my life! And you, accursed dogs, woe to that one who dares lay hand upon a bishop of Christ's Church! He he accursed for ever and ever, he be cut off from the flock of the faithful in this world, and become a howling fiend in the world to come! Lower your swords, and respect the anointed of the Lord!"

Ruy Lopez continued, in a mingled jargon of Spanish and Latin, to repeat one of those formulas of excommunication, denunciation and malediction, which, at this epoch, produced such an impression upon the minds of the masses.

The effect of this harangue was immediate. The assistant stood motionless, and Calavar reflected that to slay a bishop without a precise order from the King, would subject him to the greatest misfortunes in this world, and everlasting punishment in the next.

"I will go to the King," he said.

"Go, then," replied the bishop, still standing on his guard.

The hangman knew not what to do. He pondered for a moment. To go and announce this news to Philip, who was expecting the head of the traitor, was to expose himself to great danger. To attack the priest and the culprit was hazardous, for Ruy Lopez was endowed with great strength, and the Duke smiled at the thoughts of a combat. Calavar, at last, took the resolution which appeared the wisest. He waited.

"Will you promise to finish in half an hour?" he asked.

"I promise it!" replied the Duke.

"Proceed, then," rejoined the headsman.

A truce being thus concluded, the players resumed their places and their game.

Calavar, who himself understood the game, gazed involuntarily at the moves of each of the players, and his satellites formed a barrier around them, which seemed to say to the Duke:

"You, also, will finish with this game!"

Don Guzman gazed about him for a moment, for his calmness had not forsaken him.

"I have never before played in so noble a company," he said. "Bear witness, ye hangmen, that for once in my life, I have beaten Don Lopez, and attest it after my death."

He then resumed his game, smiling with a calm and pallid smile, like a sun-beam which gleams for an instant upon the snow-clad summits of the Alps.

CHAPTER III.

THE ROLL OF PARCHMENT.

If the three hours had passed slowly in the dungeon of the prisoner, they had not flown more rapidly at the palace of King Philip. The moment had finished his game with his favorite Don Ramirez, of Biscay, and his nobles, forced by the rules of etiquette to remain standing, appeared ready to sink beneath a fatigue, which was increased by the weight of their armor.

Don Tarraxa stood motionless, with his eyes half closed; he seemed like one of those mailed statues which are seen in ancient gothic halls. Young Ocanna, overcome with weariness and sorrow, was leaning against a marble column. King Philip was pacing the apartment with hurried strides, listening attentively for some distant sound. In accordance with the superstitious custom of the age, the King kneeled, at intervals, at the feet of a statue of the Virgin, which was placed upon a pedestal of porphyry, taken from the ruins of the Alhambra, and prayed the Madonna to pardon him for the work of blood which he had just decreed; he then turned to examine the hourglass. All was silent as the abode of Azrael, the angel of death, no one whatever his rank, might venture to open his lips before his sovereign, except at his bidding. When the last grain of sand, which marked the fatal interval, had fallen, the King uttered a cry of joy, and exclaimed:

"The traitor dies!"

A suppressed murmur ran through the assembly.

"The time has expired," added Philip, and with it, Count of Biscay, your enemy has fallen like the leaven of the olive tree before the hurricane."

"My enemy, sire!" exclaimed Ramirez, with feigned surprise.

"Yes, Count," replied Philip, in a slight tone of malice, "wherefore repeat our words? Were you not a rival of Don Guzman's, for the love of Donna Estella, and can two rivals be friends? It is true we have not spoken of this in our council, but our royal word is passed. Donna Estella shall be yours! The maiden will bring you a rich dowry, both in beauty and in wealth. You see, Count, that if the world prates of the ingratitude of Kings, you, at least, can say that we have not forgotten the true friend of Spain and of its monarch; him, who brought to light the conspiracy of Don Guzman and his correspondence with the King of France."

Don Ramirez, of Biscay, listened to the King's words with an air of restlessness and disquietude. He did not raise his eyes from the ground; it seemed as if he shrunk from these public testimonials of royal favor. Still he endeavored to reply.

"Sire," he said, "it was with great repugnance that I fulfilled a painful duty—"

He was unable to continue; his voice faltered, and his features were agitated.

Tarraxa coughed slightly, and Ocanna stayed the hilt of his sword with his armed hand.

"Before Estella shall become the bride of this man," he muttered, "I will sleep in the grave where now sleeps my noble cousin. To-morrow will be a day of vengeance!"

The King continued:

"Your zeal and devotion, Don Ramirez, shall be recompensed. The preserver of our throne, and perhaps of our dynasty, merits no common recompense. This morning we directed you and our Chief Chancellor to draw up the letters patent which invest you with the rank of Duke, and the high office of Governor of Valencia; are these letters ready for our signature?"

Don Ramirez turned pale; this recompense seemed to overwhelm him. He shuddered; his sight grew confused. The King extended his hand. The Count drew hurriedly from his bosom a roll of parchment, and sinking upon his knees before the King, he presented it to his majesty, who received it saying:

"To sign these letters patent shall be our first public act this day. The headsman has already punished the traitor; it is time that the King should recompense the loyal vassal."

Philip now unfolded the parchment. His face suddenly assumed an expression of deep indignation, his eye flashed, and he exclaimed in a harsh and angry tone:

"Holy virgin! what do I see!"

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHECK.

The game of chess was finished; Don Guzman had beaten Ruy Lopez, his triumph was complete; he rose.

"I am ever the devoted servant of my King," he said, turning to Calavar.

The headsman understood these words, and at a sign from him his assistants prepared the block. In the meanwhile Don Guzman advanced towards the crucifix, and said with a firm voice:

"Oh, God, let this rash and unjust deed return upon him who has compassed it, but let not my blood fall like coals of fire upon the head of my sovereign!"

Ruy Lopez prostrated himself upon the ground, and concealing his face in his robe, he recited the prayers for the dying.

Calavar placed his hand upon the Duke's shoulder, to remove his ruff. Don Guzman started back.

"Let nothing of thine except that steel touch my neck, and I remember, also, Sancho's reply; 'Let it remain, sire!' exclaimed Ramirez, with feigned surprise.

"Yes, Count," replied Philip, in a slight tone of malice, "wherefore repeat our words? Were you not a rival of Don Guzman's, for the love of Donna Estella, and can two rivals be friends? It is true we have not spoken of this in our council, but our royal word is passed. Donna Estella shall be yours! The maiden will bring you a rich dowry, both in beauty and in wealth. You see, Count, that if the world prates of the ingratitude of Kings, you, at least, can say that we have not forgotten the true friend of Spain and of its monarch; him, who brought to light the conspiracy of Don Guzman and his correspondence with the King of France."

Don Ramirez, of Biscay, listened to the King's words with an air of restlessness and disquietude. He did not raise his eyes from the ground; it seemed as if he shrunk from these public testimonials of royal favor. Still he endeavored to reply.

"Sire," he said, "it was with great repugnance that I fulfilled a painful duty—"

He was unable to continue; his voice faltered, and his features were agitated.

Tarraxa coughed slightly, and Ocanna stayed the hilt of his sword with his armed hand.

"Before Estella shall become the bride of this man," he muttered, "I will sleep in the grave where now sleeps my noble cousin. To-morrow will be a day of vengeance!"

The King continued:

"Your zeal and devotion, Don Ramirez, shall be recompensed. The preserver of our throne, and perhaps of our dynasty, merits no common recompense. This morning we directed you and our Chief Chancellor to draw up the letters patent which invest you with the rank of Duke, and the high office of Governor of Valencia; are these letters ready for our signature?"

Don Ramirez turned pale; this recompense seemed to overwhelm him. He shuddered; his sight grew confused. The King extended his hand. The Count drew hurriedly from his bosom a roll of parchment, and sinking upon his knees before the King, he presented it to his majesty, who received it saying:

"To sign these letters patent shall be our first public act this day. The headsman has already punished the traitor; it is time that the King should recompense the loyal vassal."

Philip now unfolded the parchment. His face suddenly assumed an expression of deep indignation, his eye flashed, and he exclaimed in a harsh and angry tone:

"Holy virgin! what do I see!"

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHECK.

The game of chess was finished; Don Guzman had beaten Ruy Lopez, his triumph was complete; he rose.

"I am ever the devoted servant of my King," he said, turning to Calavar.

The headsman understood these words, and at a sign from him his assistants prepared the block. In the meanwhile Don Guzman advanced towards the crucifix, and said with a firm voice:

"Oh, God, let this rash and unjust deed return upon him who has compassed it, but let not my blood fall like coals of fire upon the head of my sovereign!"

Ruy Lopez prostrated himself upon the ground, and concealing his face in his robe, he recited the prayers for the dying.

Calavar placed his hand upon the Duke's shoulder, to remove his ruff. Don Guzman started back.

"Let nothing of thine except that steel touch my neck, and I remember, also, Sancho's reply; 'Let it remain, sire!' exclaimed Ramirez, with feigned surprise.

"Yes, Count," replied Philip, in a slight tone of malice, "wherefore repeat our words? Were you not a rival of Don Guzman's, for the love of Donna Estella, and can two rivals be friends? It is true we have not spoken of this in our council, but our royal word is passed. Donna Estella shall be yours! The maiden will bring you a rich dowry, both in beauty and in wealth. You see, Count, that if the world prates of the ingratitude of Kings, you, at least, can say that we have not forgotten the true friend of Spain and of its monarch; him, who brought to light the conspiracy of Don Guzman and his correspondence with the King of France."

Don Ramirez, of Biscay, listened to the King's words with an air of restlessness and disquietude. He did not raise his eyes from the ground; it seemed as if he shrunk from these public testimonials of royal favor. Still he endeavored to reply.

"Sire," he said, "it was with great repugnance that I fulfilled a painful duty—"

He was unable to continue; his voice faltered, and his features were agitated.

Tarraxa coughed slightly, and Ocanna stayed the hilt of his sword with his armed hand.

"Before Estella shall become the bride of this man," he muttered, "I will sleep in the grave where now sleeps my noble cousin. To-morrow will be a day of vengeance!"

The King continued:

"Your zeal and devotion, Don Ramirez, shall be recompensed. The preserver of our throne, and perhaps of our dynasty, merits no common recompense. This morning we directed you and our Chief Chancellor to draw up the letters patent which invest you with the rank of Duke, and the high office of Governor of Valencia; are these letters ready for our signature?"

Don Ramirez turned pale; this recompense seemed to overwhelm him. He shuddered; his sight grew confused. The King extended his hand. The Count drew hurriedly from his bosom a roll of parchment, and sinking upon his knees before the King, he presented it to his majesty, who received it saying:

"To sign these letters patent shall be our first public act this day. The headsman has already punished the traitor; it is time that the King should recompense the loyal vassal."

Philip now unfolded the parchment. His face suddenly assumed an expression of deep indignation, his eye flashed, and he exclaimed in a harsh and angry tone:

"Holy virgin! what do I see!"

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHECK.

The game of chess was finished; Don Guzman had beaten Ruy Lopez, his triumph was complete; he rose.

"I am ever the devoted servant of my King," he said, turning to Calavar.

The headsman understood these words, and at a sign from him his assistants prepared the block. In the meanwhile Don Guzman advanced towards the crucifix, and said with a firm voice:

"Oh, God, let this rash and unjust deed return upon him who has compassed it, but let not my blood fall like coals of fire upon the head of my sovereign!"

Ruy Lopez prostrated himself upon the ground, and concealing his face in his robe, he recited the prayers for the dying.

Calavar placed his hand upon the Duke's shoulder, to remove his ruff. Don Guzman started back.

"Let nothing of thine except that steel touch my neck, and I remember, also, Sancho's reply;

Our Portrait Gallery.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL TWIGGS.

For the above engraving we are indebted to "Scott and Staff," recently published by Messrs. Grigg & Elliot, of this city.

Our Picture Gallery.

WASHINGTON'S HEAD-QUARTERS AT CAMBRIDGE.

The above engraving of Washington's Head-Quarters at Cambridge, near Boston, is taken from the "Military Heroes of the Revolution." The building is still standing, and is occupied by the post Longfellow.

Original Poetry.

THE WHITE DAISY.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. BY RICHARD COE, JR.

There is a little dainty flower,
That lifts its golden eye,
Without a single tinge of shame,
Unblushing to the sky;
But yet, so sweetly free from art,
It captivates the thoughtful heart!

It gleds the merry month of May,
On August smiles a cheer;
It greets the pale October day,
"The saddest of the year;"
And still an open bosom shows
Amid the cold December snows.

It roams upon the mountain's top,
To catch the morning sun;
It plays about the meadow's slope
The merry brooklets run.
Upon the forest's solitudes
The pretty daisy's form intrudes.

And offtimes on the infant's grave
This little flower will bend,
Nor might more fitting thus to bloom
On consecrated ground;
'Tis beautiful without pretence,
An emblem sweet of innocence.

SONGS OF OLD SAYINGS.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. BY HENRY MORFORD.

LET IT COME.

Let it come, let it come, there has never been given
There are flowers as bright as ever;
Shall we weep for a love thrown out in vain,
And deep sate death? let it never!
We live in a world where all that's bright
Dies out with the leaf and blossom,
But leaving a fond and holy light
To rest on the cheek and bosom.

Let it come, let it come, there has never been
A winter that stand forever,—
Shall we forget how the young buds green
With the Spring come forth? Oh never
Let a withered hope be the human heart,
And an evergreen beside it,
And ever when Grief claims a larger part,
Oh still with Hope divide it!

Sketches of Russia.

THE CZAR;

His Court, his Camp, and his People.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

EXILE TO SIBERIA.

Exile to Siberia now remains to be considered. To understand this punishment well, a glance at the country itself seems to be necessary. This immense country stretches across the continent of Asia, from an average latitude of about 52 deg. North, to the Frozen Ocean, having Tartary and the Chinese Empire on its Southern boundary. It embraces an area of about two-thirds of the whole of the Russian Empire, whilst its population only amounts to about 2,700,000, or one-twentieth of the entire population thereof. It is a region of intense cold, which increases in severity in the same latitude as you progress eastwardly. From its Southern border to about the 50th or 59th deg. of North latitude, the ordinary products of the same latitude in Europe are found in the more Western parts, but beyond, that is increased in sterility. For eight months in the year winter reigns supreme throughout; and in the higher regions it is in fact an eternal winter. The face of the country may be divided into four grand divisions: 1st. The low and marshy grounds. 2nd. The Salt Steppes. 3d. Plains of Moderate Elevation. 4th. The mountains, which are uninhabitable.

The low and marshy grounds extend from East to West, between the 60 deg. of latitude and the Frozen Ocean. These vast regions are entirely uncultivated, but on the water courses where the industry of the human race has reared some habitations, dwellings for hunters, who obtain the valuable skins of the finer quality in those high regions, and marts for their sale to merchants from more favored climes. The Russians cannot live there.

The low and Salt Steppes, lying between the Obi and the Tobol, contain the principal part of the population. The land in the Southern part of this region is of a fair quality, and could readily support a more numerous population than now inhabits it.

The plains of moderate elevation lie between the Tobol and the Oural Mountains. The Western part of them is comparatively well peopled, the Eastern has but few inhabitants.

Tobolsk, situated in the 58 deg. North latitude, is the capital. The cold is much more severe than in the same latitude in Europe. There is, properly speaking, no spring or autumn. Summer succeeds winter with rapid steps, and as rapidly resumes. A few days only are required to transform the chilly aspect of winter to the smiling beauty of summer. What is spring in more favored climes, is here but a season of mud and vapor, caused by the breaking up of the frost and the melting of the snow. The delectable region is the Botany Bay of Russia.

The code of the Czar, Alexis Mikhailovitch, included exile to Siberia as one of its punishments. Transportation, however, did not become a general principle until 1760, or about fifteen years after the death penalty had been abolished. In 1799 a distinction was made among the exiles, some were condemned to civil death, others to more correctional punishments; the former were forced to labor, the latter were simply exiled from their homes. The number of persons in exile,

United States SATURDAY POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1848.

TO POSTMASTERS.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will assist themselves and get up large clubs for the Saturday Post; or if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offers themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and responsible person, who will be willing to do so. We think these need be no great difficulty in getting subscribers to the enclosed paper, as those who will take the trouble to compare it with the other weekly papers, cannot fail to perceive that it outshines all competition. Let it be remembered, also, that the postage is just the same as a first class paper, as on the moment and period of the small reprints.

OUR PREMIUM.

We are afraid that our subscribers generally are not bearing in mind our premium offer (made in our Prospectus) to the Post Office sending in the largest number of subscribers. Nothing can be lost by endeavoring to win the premium, while whatever other successes will have its papers sent free for nothing.

NOTICE.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

All persons addressing letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State as well as of the town in which they live.

Post Masters or others sending for a club, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address when they can do so conveniently.

AN IMPOSTOR.

An individual who signs his name as Henry E. Patterson, has been passing himself off as an agent of the Post, in Tennessee. All genuine agents have credentials, and they are happy to show them. Henry E. Patterson has no credentials, and is an impostor.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

The following are the provisions of the new "bill to regulate postage on newspapers, &c.," reported from the Committee on the Post Office, and read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

1. All newspapers not exceeding 1,900 square inches in size, (sent "by the editors or publishers thereof,") to go free for 30 miles; for any distance beyond 30 and not exceeding 100 miles,—or within 30 the limits of the State,—½ cent; for more than 100 miles (except within the State) 1 cent. Papers exceeding 1,900 square inches are to be charged by weight, like magazines and pamphlets.

2. Papers of a less size than 500 square inches, for 30 miles, free,—and for all distances exceeding 30 miles, a uniform rate of ½ cent.

3. Printed and lithographed circulars, handbills, &c., on single sheets not exceeding single cap size, unsealed, for all distances, ½ cent per sheet.

4. Pamphlets, magazines, periodicals, &c.,—2 cents per copy, if not exceeding 1 ounce,—and 1 cent additional for every additional ounce,—for all distances.

5. Publishers' exchange copies, free.

6. Newspapers, handbills and circulars (of one sheet) "not sent from the office of publication," ½ cents, pro-paid.

The above is the most equitable bill which has ever been before Congress, and we trust it will before long become the law of the land. We say equitable, for we do not consider it, except in one respect, liberal. Even at one cent—the rate out of the limits of the State and over 100 miles—the postage on a weekly paper is not of all proportion to its price. We get up a paper of the size and quality of the Post, we pay paper makers, compositors, clerks, rent, &c., &c., and charge our subscribers from one to two dollars a year; while the Government, simply for carrying it, charges 52 cents a year. This high rate of postage operates as a direct bar to the increase of circulation—for it seems to us that a Free Government should encourage, as far as it constitutionally can, the reading of these great substantial volumes which give form to the history of the present age, as fast as it becomes history, and contain a vast deal of information upon all subjects, calculated to refine and instruct the hearts and minds of the people. Newspapers, like the schoolmaster, may sometimes inculcate wrong notions of things, but what institutions or agencies on the whole, are more conducive to the general good? Now if the States may constitutionally and properly encourage schools and colleges, may they not also encourage that teacher and counselor of grown men and women, the newspaper? The States have parted with their power over the Post Office, through which alone they could most properly give that encouragement—but the National Government, in accepting the power, also accepted its responsibilities and its duties.

Not the present act merely that legislation should keep pace with the age. Publishers are prepared to send the papers where they now send one; they are able to hold themselves up to the people to subscribe, both as to price and quality, such as never were held out before. They now come before Congress, and ask a reduction in postage, promising to make it up on a degree, in the amount transmitted mailed. As to the extent of that reduction at the present time, it seems but little. We should be satisfied, for the present, with the passage of the bill to where provisions we have allude. We are willing that a cautious Cave Johnson should feel his way—we are willing to forget for a while that if newspapers were carried at the same freight or passenger rates, the postage would be nearer one-eighth of a cent, than one cent—we, not one, are willing to be thankful to Congress for small favors, and to point as the largest kind of favors the "assistance of all those members who voted for the new law."

WORTH TRYING.

The Pittsburg Post says that a large number of workmen in the different rolling mills in and about that city have it in contemplation to erect a new iron establishment—furnishing their own capital, conducting their own business, and sharing the profits equally.

It is proposed that two hundred persons, practical workmen, should contribute their capital, skill, and energy, and form a company, to be governed by rules and regulations of their own adoption. Each member shall furnish $100, to be put into the general fund, which will make in the aggregate a capital of $100,000 with which to commence business. Each member of the association will have a particular branch assigned to him—all will be actively employed—there will be no drones or idlers.

They propose now to establish in connection with the manufacture of iron of all kinds, a short tin manufactory—of which latter there are none in the United States. The block tin, which is imported principally from Peru, carries about 19 per cent. of the ingredients of the sheet; the balance being zinc, of course the manufacture will not be so difficult as some suppose.

We think the plan of a workmen's joint stock company is worth trying, again and again—but we have not the most encouraging hopes of its present success. The workmen may think they will gain much by having "no drones or idlers," but if they call the owners and managers of such establishments idlers the old system, "drones and idlers," because they do but little hard work, they will find that they will have to begin to sound and their old number a similar part, or else find themselves getting bewildered. And here, we think, is precisely the rock upon which such associations will generally split. Every man will wish to be "boss," and had it impossible, even then all capable of being so. Even in a Republican Government, we have to choose a master for four years. If such a company, however, have the sense to choose their boss men to be the managing part of the business or have, they will find that men able to do that managing will not be satisfied with common wages. Hard work will always claim higher wages than hard work, and will always get it.

If, however, the association in question does not split upon this point, and if its members are sober, sensible, and not visionary men, we do not see why it should not moderately prosper, and divide a fair dividend, on the average, between the members, over and above the wages paid to them.—Certainly we wish it may be so, for the success of such an experiment would greatly move strongly, than perhaps anything else, for the increasing intelligence of those who are called rather indefinitely and obscurely, the "laboring classes" of society.

KISSING.

A young gentleman of Buffalo was married four fifteen dollars and costs for kissing a young married lady at that city against her choice and consent. The original evidence will give common, every-day people an insight into the manners and customs of the "first white circles." He pleaded that among the aristocracy and higher classes, to which he belonged, such liberties were permitted by the married ladies. Judge Conrad, however—probably not belonging to the "first circles"—would not recognize the excuse as satisfactory. We regret though, that the fine was but fifty dollars instead of fifteen. This kissing young ladies, and especially married ladies, against their will, should be regarded by the Courts as a high crime and misdemeanor, and punished accordingly. A fine guilty of such an offence should also be fined something additional for being a fool; for a man, of all things in the world, is only valuable in proportion as it is a "fine man."

GENERAL SCOTT.

Gen. Scott, and some members of his Staff, arrived at New York on the 21st, in the brig St. Pittsburgh, from Vera Cruz.

THE FRENCH WOMEN.

A member of the Parisian women, it is said, have organized themselves into a society to effect the "emancipation of women." What the women want, it is rather difficult to determine; but it appears evident that they are determined upon a change of some kind, in these days of revolution. Whether they intend to accomplish their purpose by force, or by influence, is not stated. They thought of course to influence the citizens, by their example they manifested the usual feminine prevarication and tact. They advised women to influence their husband's votes, in the following words:

"Whatever concerns you, adapt to win a Brocot to vary favor which you wish from your husband, take the same course to secure his vote.

"Only remember that no efforts must be spared. If it is necessary to make use of nervous attacks, spasms, dramatic scenes, do not hesitate a moment. Think that if you prevent a Blanchaille your duties are also."

Odd conditions were prescribed by the circular. It says: "The representatives you elect should be young—there should be no men of the past; their hearts are dead, their souls petrified. Proscribe them, even when they make the most beautiful protestations. You know that it is not safe to trust to the promises of age, grown calculating and full of prejudice.

"From twenty-five to thirty is the best age. And it is possible to find good men of thirty-five, but beyond that age there is no candidate for us."

Whether the women succeeded in electing candidates favorable to what they call the "holy cause of the political and social rights of women," is not yet known. We shall lay the result at the earliest possible period before our readers.

LATE CHANGES.

Some months ago, we were thinking of the policy of offering a small insurance upon our life—a thing, by the way, which few men, in this fluctuating world, should neglect—when the question naturally arose in what office to insure. Now a London Company has been using much exertion to get customers in this country, and the terms offered by it are so liberal, that many of our citizens have embraced them. We were strongly advised to do the same; but we had a shrinking from it. We disliked, in the first place, to insure in a British Company, when there were plenty of American ones, of undoubted solvency. Again, we had vague fears of a possible war. On the whole, we concluded not to deal with the foreigners. At that time, it was only a few months ago, any one who had expressed doubts as to the permanency of the whole financial system of England, would have been laughed at. But the momentous changes on the Continent of Europe alone then, and the consequent impulse communicated to the depressed classes of Great Britain—the earthquake and its rockings—have thrown great doubt over the safety of every British investment. For the capital of English Bankers, and Financial Companies of all kinds, is so connected with the National finances, that the republication, even for a short time, of the national debt, would give a fatal shock to the whole of them. The conclusion we come to, is, that it is very foolish as well as unpatriotic, for Americans to invest funds beneath the shadow of the notable institutions of Monarchy and Aristocracy. When earthquakes begin to rock, beware the neighborhood of palaces.

THE FOURIERITES.

The Fourierites complain that they are identified by the press with the Communists, in spite of the late attempt in France on the part of the latter to overthrow the Provisional Government. They say that their principles are very different from those of the Communists. The Fourierites are in favor of dividing the proceeds of their "Phalanxes," in the proportion of five-twelfths to capital, four-twelfths to labor, and three-twelfths to skill. The Communists wish an equal division of the proceeds of industry, without regard to either capital or skill, and, if we are not mistaken, without much regard to the amount of labor either. The Fourierites recognize individual property, in the shape of shares in the Association—the Communists do not. We are not certain, however, but that the principles, or rather the great general principle of the Fourierites can reduce as in a germ, more wickedness and excess of all kinds, than any principle of the Communists. If it be what after considerable examination we think it is, and which may be summed up in two words, "Indulge thyself!"—just the opposite to Christianity, in fact, to that laid down by the Saviour, "Deny, restrain thyself!"—we think it a terribly mischievous one. If we are mistaken, however, in thus stating the great leading principle of Fourier's system, the corner-stone upon which all is systematically built, we must say that it is a system which any one who reads Albert Brisbane's work on Fourierism (which is "canonical," we believe) can hardly avoid falling into.

LAMARTINE'S VIEWS.

In the reply of M. Lamartine to an address presented to the Provisional Government by the Society of Political Economy, he gave an exposition of his views, from which we take the following sentences, that will enable our readers to catch a slight glimpse of where he stands. Although a Communist nor Fourierite, Lamartine evidently is awake to what promises to become the great question of the Age—the "Reorganization of Labor." He said:

Animal science traded only to render individuals healthy, but our new science will apply itself to make the entire people rich. Among the theories which are presented to attain this object there are some false, some doubtful, and some true. It is for you to precede the Government in enlightening it on the choice of practical means to excite labor, and to raise the condition of the masses without diminishing the well-being of manufacturers and landed proprietors, and, particularly, without interfering with the free employment of capital, which disappears as soon as its independence is contracted.

To conciliate property, that foundation of family, that source of population, that emulation of agriculture, with the liberty of labor, and the increase of wages—such is the problem, any other is an error—it is a subversion in place of an amelioration. The Republic was not created to destroy, but to ameliorate the conditions of labor and property. Make it your study to resolve this problem in the spirit of the new and regular Republic which France will have, and trust not that in order to solve it, one Divine principle, which sanctions all others, must be inscribed above all our labors—God, the people and fraternity.

OATHS.

After the examination of the credentials of a number of the members of the new French Assembly, the following scene took place:

M. Demosthenes Ollivier rose and demanded that, after the admission of every member, he should mount the tribune, and there, in presence of the assembly, take the oath of allegiance to the Republic. A number of members here interrupted the speaker, crying: "The oath is abolished!" "By whom?" asked M. Ollivier. "By the Provisional Government." "What," continued M. Ollivier, "do you place the power of the Provisional Government above that of the National Assembly?" (Cries, "The oath is abolished and is over.")

M. Cremieux, the Minister of Justice, then rose and said that the oath of allegiance had been the occasion of so much scandal during the last sixty years, and had excited such universal indignation, that the Provisional Government had thought proper to abolish it. The oath of every true republican, added the minister, is in his heart, and not on his lips.

The assembly received this declaration of the Minister with great applause and ratified, by its continuous approbation, the measure adopted by the Provisional Government, amid deafening cries of "Vive la République!" and "Vive le Gouvernement Provisoire."

BARBARISM.

The wreck of a Japanese junk was recently adrift in the bay of Yedo, with the bodies of twenty-seven men on it and its crew had been drifting from the waters. The original number of the crew was twenty-one, but when Captain Poole discovered them they were reduced to four, and in a starving condition. The crew had drawn lots to decide who should be killed and eaten; the one upon whom the lot fell, if able, gladly let his life, and in some instances succeeded in killing one of the others, in which case the murdered man was first eaten. The survivors were shockingly scarred with dirk and knife wounds, and of their lives had been often attempted by their companions. Capt. Poole kept them on board his ship for thirty-six days, and then put them on board a boat fishing boats, close to shore, that had left 40 N. They were exceedingly grateful, and manifested much emotion on leaving the vessel.

In reading the above, we could not but perceive the difference between the civilized man and the barbarian. Reduced to such extremities, the civilized man, even in the management of famished nature, still adheres to rule, to law. Whenever the lot once against must die. There is no secret stabbing—all is as open and fair as it is horrible. Not with the savage, all is disorder, treachery and consternation. Truly, order gives a kind of beauty to contrast, even to what is most horrible and infernal.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

We procrastinate the House of Representatives has passed a bill for the purchase of the "Madison Papers." We thought the "Madison Papers" had already been purchased—at least each of them as concerned the nation. Before the Senate also passes the bill, we hope it will take care to provide that this last batch shall exclude the whole of the lot. We know very little about the matter, but it seems rather small fastened on the face of it.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

A statue of Mr. Adams was taken by J. Bonnaby, a few hours previous to the death of the veteran statesman. An engraving taken from the sketch is now for sale by T. B. Peterson, in Chestnut st. Price 50 cents.

HAYTI.

The black population of Hayti have risen against the mulattoes. A large number of the latter are said to have been massacred. The origin of the quarrel is still involved in uncertainty.

A CAPITAL LETTER.

Our readers will remember that it was recently reported, and by many believed, that Louis Philippe had arrived in the United States, under the assumed name of Patterson. The New York Sun, in particular, boldly asserted that such was the fact, and subsequently published an inquiry as to the whereabouts of the Ex-Monarch Louis Philippe. This inquiry drew forth the following letter, which is one of the best pieces of burlesque we have seen for a long time. The blundering style of a French man but recently arrived, mingled with the English language, is admirably imitated:

"I have seen in your paper very respectable, not you have concern, as arrive from France in a steam paquet—, Monsieur Andrew Egalite Patterson. Et, Monsieur, you have make soon fun with de name of Mons. Patterson—but is not my name monsieur, but by gar, mon nom, it is Vattemen, Monsieur, vicent de Philippe or ex Egalite.

"I have de great misfortune, vat make troublesome for grass rpoon, Louis Philippe;—because of dat, I am myself force to fly from my patrie. In every place, all against, all to time, on gamins and on sans culottes of Paris dey take me for ci-devant king—by dam.

"Eh! vat vill I do?—I no can sleep—I no can eat at no cafe—I no can promenade on les boulevards—I no can visit at no theatre—I no can do no thing—every body, he say dere go no dagueretype vicent or Louis Philippe.

"Eh bien, monsieur, I say to myself I shall go distract, what you call in Amerique, crazie. I never can exist, not no more, en France. I retire to my cabinet! seize one pistolet—I go in blow my stupid head in tousand million pieces! Mais, Monsieur, at dat moment, I see pass before my hotel, de soldats, wid de musique, and he play very magnifique, ye Yankee Doodlie. Ah ha! monsieur c'est ce, I think tout de route, et l'Amerique, Eh—been I never be trouble dere host Louis Philippe. I trow my pistolet au feu. I take my depart from Paris. I go my self aboard ze Britannia and I come to dis contree.

"En passagers or ze Steam-o-boat, erree vas no one know I am Louis Philippe—sacre!—day ate me, all ze time, erree day,—entre majesty, bon jour,—you take glass wine, you majestie,—ver beautiful day, you majestie;—it tousand time more bat as Paris.

"En route, Monsieur, I arrive;—I lend my self at de Jardin Citee,—by gar all de name erree body he come ran ver fast from New York, for see Louis Philippe—you paper he say he vas arrive,—by gar dey all come see. I vas distract,—furieux—I go send vis cabriolet.

"Mais, monsieur, I make escape myself in von carosse to Bordentown—den I say—ah ha! sare traire, you all sale now, you see nobody, notings you never have pat name so odieux, so horrible-nat name which I navare can pronouce.

"I trow hatin in my pocket; I navare may see no visage horrible like so ci-devant king—von monsieur I vas astonish—I vas assemble de douleurs, I was enraged to see in your paper so terrible question—vere is Andrew Philippe Egalite Patterson?

"I tremble vis rage, and I am myself come to New York, to make explanation for erree body, dat I am myself not Louis Philippe, mais, monsieur, dat I am some oder personne.

"Vill you kiss, monsieur, say to the peoples, dat I navare was king, dat I am not Louis Philippe, and dat he is von oder gentilhomme.

"Monsieur, Je vous salute,

"ANDREW VATTRESON."

ADDRESS TO IRISHMEN.

The Executive Committee of the Friends of Ireland in this city, have issued an Address to the the Friends of Ireland throughout the State, appealing to them.

"To rush to the rescue, and rally to save,
If you boast but one drop of the blood of the brave."

The Committee say that they ask not the breaking of any law, or the sacrificing of any principle of duty to this country. The following is the conclusion of the Address:

Ireland can be assisted without the commission of a single wrongful act. Call meetings, collect funds, and, if a more appropriate channel does not present itself to your consideration, forward them to the treasurer or any Finance Committee, or the Treasurer of this Committee, whose address is given below—American citizens selected for their probity and respectability, and who will see that the best use is made of your subscriptions. In the, and when Ireland is free, the trouble you have had will be more than compensated, in having aided to raise a country, surrounded and hallowed by so many chivalric and heroic influences—so many generous and romantic associations—from a debasing thraldom to the dignity and destiny of a free nation.

Robt. Tyler,	Jos. R. Chandler,
Francis Tiernan,	Wm. Dunnan,
John B. Colahan,	James Fair,
James Gibbons,	John W. Forney,
Wm. H. Dunn,	John W. Stanley,
Jos. Dugan,	P. M. O'Brian,
John Killion,	John Bunn,
Chas. D. Lynnard,	Miles D. Sweeny,
Dennis Mealis,	Benjamin Kennedy,
James McCann,	Cor. McCaulley.
John Mann,

N. B.—Please address Francis Tiernan, Esq., Chairman of Finance Committee, or James McCann, Esq., Treasurer of Executive Committee, Philadelphia.

VIRGINIA LANDS.

A correspondent wishes us to run from New Manchester, Brooke county, Va., under date of May 15th, as follows:

Gentlemen—I saw the following article in your paper of the 20th of April, 1848:—"In Western Virginia it is advertised that a man of family who will move on, can have fifty acres of land for nothing. The settlers have the privilege of buying from the owner 100 or more acres adjoining, at $1.00 per acre, payable in two, three and four years."

Upon the reception of this letter be so obliging as to publish in your next paper in what county of Western Virginia, what the land is, Western Virginia, and who is the owner or the agent to dispose of said lands. This information would be highly appreciated by me and by my neighbors, as I saw your and any paper published in this part of Virginia containing the information sought for.

Your immediate attention to this request will be a particular favor, not to be forgotten. A. H.

The article to which our correspondent refers, was copied from another paper. We therefore are not able to answer his question; but we publish his letter, in order that any of our readers who possess the required information may furnish it.

YUCATAN.

The following are the terms of the Treaty entered into between the Yucatan Government, and that, the leader of the Insurgent Indians:—1st, Pardon for all past life of the Indians of Yucatan; 2nd, D. Miguel Barbachano shall be Governor for life of the whites of the State; 3rd, Twenty-five hundred muskets taken from the Indians before the war, shall be given up to Pat; 4th, All debts due by the Indians to their masters shall be forgiven; 5th, Unoccupied lands which have been sold by the Government, shall be again held in common; 6th, No personal tax shall be paid in Yucatan; 7th, [This article provides that the droit de seule shall be reduced. We do not know the nature of the impost. Possibly the article could throw open offices in the Church more widely to the Indian population.]

It may be well to state that "Pat" is not of Irish descent, as some might suppose. Pat is said to be a genuine Indian name.

IRISH LANDLORDS.

The tenants of the Irish landowners seem to be composed of such very hard materials, that really we do not wonder the people despair of softening them in any other way, than by the dire test of insurrection. They still continue, in many parts of the island, to "evict" their tenants, turning them out of their cottages, that they may have the land for grazing farms, and leaving the wretched tenantry to die on the road-side with hunger and disease. A correspondent of the Cork Examiner states that Mr. Longfield, of Castlemoney, has evicted seventy-one tenants, within the last two months, from his estate between Clogne and Beltyacation. The houses are levelled, and the lands remain uncultivated. There is famine in the land. What wonder!

"There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart
It does not feel for man."

UNSATISFACTORY.

What an unofficial, unsatisfactory world this is the Court of Inquiry did not succeed, after all, in settling to the satisfaction of every one, that Gen. Pillow really did "kill a Mexican." Gen. Scott contends he did not, and impeaches the testimony of Private Ayres, who says he saw him do it. But then we must remember that it has been repeatedly conceded even that Col. Johnson killed Tecumseh. Little doubts, however, must not be allowed to stand in the way on such occasions. The Mexican was killed, that is one fact, certain. Gen. Pillow was present when he was killed, that is another fact, equally certain. Now, if Gen. Pillow did not kill "that Mexican officer," who did kill him?

FEMALE RIGHTS.

"Give an inch, and they'll take an ell," is an old proverb, and therefore we are not surprised to see the following quoted by a contemporary from the columns of the "Pittsburg Saturday Visiter," edited by a lady:

"A lady has a right to kiss anybody she pleases, and it is nobody's business but her husband's, and not much of his either if he thinks so."

Perhaps, though, the fair editor of the Visiter means that a lady has a right to kiss whom she pleases, because a lady never pleases to kiss anybody whom she has not a right to kiss.

FRANCE AND AMERICA.

The new Republic has been officially recognized by our Government, through Mr. Rush. There was quite a "demonstration" of good will to this country, when Mr. Rush presented his credentials. The American minister made a speech, to which Lagnerian replied. The latter concluded his address with the assertion that, "Every Frenchman will for the Americans the heart of Lafayette." Altogether, it was quite a fraternizing time.

OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Rev. J. A. of Tuscaloosa, Ala. says:

"Will you please credit me with one year's subscription to my old "family paper," the Saturday Evening Post? I have subscribed for many times years, and never found it lower than at the present time. Go on and prosper."

A lady writes to us from Frederick county, Md., as follows:

Gentlemen:—Excuse my presumption, in not having subscribed for this my favorite subscription to your invaluable family paper; in this respect I feel that I have been the greater sufferer, for ever since I has been stopped it seems as though some dear familiar face were wanting in the family circle.

Your strict attention in fulfilling your promises with respect to the purity and delicacy of your selections, has made on your best friend in our neighborhood, and of this you would be made possible in a more profitable way, were our neighbors more wealthy. We have discontinued many papers, because they were the intelligencers of the march of crime and depravity to place in the hands of our daughters and sons, but, when yours reaches us, there is an eager eye for the first reading, and no entirely prevalent our hearts as to its evil results.

Accept, gentlemen, my warmest approbation, and please excuse my negligence; it shall not happen again I assure you.

Such incentives as the above, and we are happy to say that we receive many of them, are like a fresh breeze and the perfume of roses along our path. Generally, of course, we take no public notice of them; but these write them must not think for that reason that we respond to them, in spirit, the less warmly. It is our ambition to make the Post a welcome weekly guest in the family circles of our subscribers—yes, more than a mere guest, a loved and valued friend; and pleasant indeed is it, when we feel we have succeeded.

TERRIBLE.

A man named Pickleton, a ship-carpenter, in Edgecomb, Maine, recently killed his wife and four children, and then cut his own throat. He was about 45 years of age, the oldest child about twelve. Both husband and wife were victims of the Miller delusion, and they left a statement, in the handwriting of both, setting forth that they had become tired of life—that there was nothing in prospect for them worth living for, and that they had mutually agreed upon the destruction of themselves and children; requesting that their bodies might be deposited in a stone tomb.

The wife, when found, was in bed, partially undressed, the eyes open, as if she was awake at the moment of decapitation. The children were also in bed, probably sleeping unconscious of any danger.

We publish this to show the danger of these delusions. Millerism has already numbered its hundreds of victims.

AN AMERICAN CITY.

Mr. Leonard, the Alms House Commissioner of New York city, in his report to the city authorities, mentions some startling facts. He says that five thousand three hundred and twenty-eight persons are supported as paupers or prisoners, at the different city institutions, and that forty-four thousand, five hundred and seventy-two persons have claimed and and received the relief of the public authorities as out-door poor. Taking into consideration the thousands sustained by private charity, by churches, benevolent societies, &c., he estimates that not less than one hundred thousand persons, or one-fourth of the whole population, is supported wholly or in part by charity and alms.

We do not wonder that men turn Fourierites, Communists, Shaking Quakers, or anything else, when such is the state of things, in the nineteenth century, in an American city.

New Publications.

The John Donkey.—Last Saturday's Donkey contained an able article entitled "Who Wilmot Proviso men at the door of the Democratic Convention. "John" is livelier than usual this week. He holds up the English Press, which most absurdly and phenomenally praises of the corruption of the French Elections, to well deserved ridicule. The following is a sample:

FALSE OF PRICES

The European Times says: "With universal suffrage and vote by ballot, votes can be purchased as easily as any other article saleable in the market." This will be good news to some of the political aspirants, belonging to noble families; and of which there is no lack in "the Quarter," with a perfect rush. According to the uncontradicted statements in Parliament, a seat in that respectable body frequently costs a good hundred thousand pounds. If votes can be bought cheaper under the new system, it would be a great saving to honorable members.

The following is not bad:

FACTS RELATING TO NAVIGATION.

When any of our merchants wish to know the state of the foreign market they had better go to sea.

It will not be necessary for them to forego business transactions while on their voyage, for they will find an abundance of business on the ocean.

If they have occasion to communicate with their correspondents, they will easily find means to drop a line.

If they are fond of amusements they can roll and pitch as much as they please.

For food, Mr. Cocker will likely always to find a plenty of chickens in the main batch, especially in fowl weather. They can also get a couple of eggs when the weather is fair.

Gentlemen of low descent by going to sea will readily obtain a good berth, provided they can put their foot in the Chamber.

Ladies who are fond of knitting when at sea, need never be in want of materials for work, for any stolen will be always ready to spin them a yarn. They will find, however, much cruelty practised on board, for seamen often attach a loop to an anchor, and throw it overboard. In a storm they generally, if possible, heave two, and if they see a buoy floating, they never park him up, but always avoid him.

Life in Boston.

PASSING EVENTS IN MODERN ATHENS.

Boston, May, 1848.

Gentlemen:—By your leave, may I be permitted to give your large and scattered family of subscribers a few bird's-eye glances on local objects, of general interest, to and about the City of Notions? "Certainly," is 1st? Very well then, come along, the whole family; old and young, grave and gay, if you've time to spare please step this way. We'll cross the Common, glorious, cool, green, spacious public fee, upon which every body may go to graze: now we'll ascend a flight of broad stone steps, which brings us upon the top of Beacon Hill; whereon stands the Massachusetts State House, the corner stone of which,—says Dearborn, in his "Boston Notions"—was drawn to its destined spot on the 4th of July, 1795, by 85 been milk-white steeds, that bore, then, the number of Confederated States; the stone was then laid, by the first Governor, Samuel Adams,—in relation of John Quincy Adams—the hero and patriot, assisted by the Grand Lodge of Masons, on land formerly owned by John Hancock. This stately building is of old-fashioned architecture, 173 feet front, 61 feet deep: externally it appears two stories high, the basement 26 feet, and the next story 36 feet. The centre front is continued with an attic of 60 feet length, and 36 feet high, over which is a dome 50 feet in diameter and 20 feet high, terminating with a circular look-out lantern capped with a gilded cone. The corner stone being laid 160 feet above water level, and the cone 150 feet high, makes the State House—to use a quaint simile—look far at a distance; the most prominent feature in all views of Boston. The cost of this State House was $133,333 33, completed and opened in June, 1798. Let us enter the vestibule of this grand old structure;—always open free to visitors. The first object of special interest in the vestibule is Chantry's colossal statue of Washington, from pure white marble; chiseled so perfect and polished so fine, that you can hardly conceive it possible for the hand of mortal to have subdued cold, brittle stone into such soft and life-like ease and grace. The folds of the drapery are far beyond any sculpture I ever saw. The famed English artist got $15,000 for this production. Turning to the right, we enter the Senate Chamber, a handsome, well-furnished and carpeted chamber it is; here, over the door, in the drum, old and torn, that rattled away upon Bunker Hill, when man against man with might and will, essayed in wrath his fellow to kill. Jupiter! the old, spirit-stirring drum makes a body poetical! Yes, and by it are pendant sword and swords, used upon the same interesting occasion; the good man and true, that wielded these savage and formidable instruments were stopping beer barrels, perhaps—if we credit Hamlet's philosophy, but the old "leaguers" are here; grim indents of the past, reminding the Senators beneath them, that through their instrumentality a free people were enabled to legislate for themselves, and make laws to suit freemen. Around this Chamber are many warlike instruments, and portraits of the Governors of the Commonwealth, &c. By ascending a spiral stairway of 170 steps, we arrived at the top of the State House, from whence a view is afforded, equalled by no other in the United States, I think. Not to spin out my epistle into tedious length, we will take a view from point of the compass at present; we will look forth to the South, what a panorama; nature and art; is it possible the Bay of Naples can surpass this beautiful view? Towns and villages; mansions and cottages; splendid buildings, ponds, islands, rivers and old ocean outstretched before us. See those white sails, towns and groves of Lynn; the charming summer retreat Nahant; there is Quincy, the great granite bed, the home of John Quincy Adams; Dorchester and Roxbury, lovely villages! Looking down into the harbor, a hundred islands are there; Castle Island; Fort Independence; Thompson's Island, on which is the Farm School belonging to the city, where any person can place their boys at school and learn them to labor, (as every good Christian should) upon a farm during four or five hours each week-day. Here, also, are the Houses of Correction, Reformation and Industry, also the Insane Hospital. The House of Correction is for the punishment of petty criminals. The House of Industry is for the reception of the virtuous poor, and good order and industry are taught to be duties. The Lor bardo Italians were still progressing, but the Austrians have been gaining advantages. It is said that Austria is taking secret steps to negociate with Venice and Lombardy.

Letters from Berlin of the 20th ult., states that the Prussian Government was acting with much firmness and decision. The Berlin papers entertained a rumor of the march of the Russian Guards to the frontier, where a force of three hundred thousand Russians will be concentrated by the 1st of June.

In Spain no movement of consequence has taken place.

It is said news has arrived from St. Petersburg, stating that a treaty offensive and defensive between Russia and Denmark is arranged, and it will be positively ratified in the event of an entry of German troops into Schleswig, in which case Denmark will be supported by the whole force of the two other powers.

In Poland the most frightful excesses continue to occur.

In Galicia, Moldavia and Wallachia, the people are in a frightful state of insurrection. At Presburg the cruelties practised against the Jews are truly shocking.

In Paris the Republicans have attempted to revenge their late defeat, and Herker crossed the Rhine at the head of a thousand French and German troops. Two encounters took place with the Wurtemburg forces, the last at Schefflesin. The Republicans have now fled into Alsace and Switzerland.

In Belgium the people are tranquil. Hanover and Prussia are absorbed in the military operations against Denmark, in which, at present by land, they are completely successful; although the capture of the Danish fleet, must necessarily cast an iron very great loss to the Prussian commerce in the Baltic.

Venice, according to the latest advices received in Vienna, was closely blockaded by sea and land; in fact, its capitulation was daily expected.

The European Times furnishes the following under a postscript:—

Reports are current that the French army of the Alps had entered Savoy to aid in the defence of Italian Independence against Austria. The Monitor of yesterday published a decree granting a credit of 72,000,000 francs for war purposes.

Later accounts from Italy state that King Charles Albert had resolved to attack the Austrians in the vicinity of Verona, and was to have left the league and a half of its walls for the purpose on the 20th.

ONE DAY LATER.

The U. S. Mail steamship Hermann arrived at New York on Monday night, bringing one day later news than the Caledonia.

The Hermann has made considerable cargo and 70 passengers, she also has on board 12 camels, with their two Arab drivers, fresh from the base of the great pyramid of Egypt.

The Hermann left Bremen on the 18th of April, and arrived at Southampton the next day, but was detained for repairs at the latter port till the 6th of May.

Paris papers of the 5th and London dates to the 6th have been received. There is no additional commercial news to indicate any change in the English market.

[The following paragraph is hard to understand; as it refers to difficulties of which we have not yet been advised. It might be inferred that some outbreak of the Republicans or some attempt on the part of the minority to overturn the Chamber, had signally failed. We shall await more clear advices with solicitude.]

The following telegraphic announcement from Paris, is the latest intelligence from the French capital, received by the Hermann. It is rather imperfect and unsatisfactory:

Paris, Friday night, May 5.

Considerable uneasiness prevails, and an impression is entertained that the Proclamation of yesterday [this we are in the dark about—Ed. Post] will be followed by a fresh attempt, through General Courtais and other partisans of the minority.

Another report is that a compromise has taken place between the contending parties, and that three Consuls will be proposed, viz., Lamartine, Dupont, (De l'Eure) and Ledru Rollin. Such a coalition will, however, satisfy no party.

Moss. Ledru Rollin, E. Arago, and fifteen other Deputies met to-day, to organize an extreme left of the Assembly.

The Provisional Government will not order the assembling of the Army of the Alps, till as required by the Milan Government or by Charles Albert.

There were three candidates for the Presidency of the Assembly, and the moderate amendment, by the result—Nom. Bucher 300 votes, Talut 234, Recush 91.

The insurgents are still masters of Sneyes.—Order reigns in the midst of disorder.

Another despatch from Paris says, in confirmation of the above:

The National Assembly met at noon, and an election took place for President of the Assembly, and the moderates announced, by a majority of 300 votes, M. Bucher was chosen. Paris is tranquil.

Passenger Curiosity.—It is not, perhaps, generally known that currants and gooseberries may be preserved, the year round, as fresh and sweet as when taken from the bush. The fruit should be picked while green, or before the berries assume the red color which precedes and heralds maturity, and put into dry glass bottles, which should be corked and sealed tight, and placed in the cellar or some other cool place as most convenient.

Honey.—A kind of Pegasus upon which, when a man is once mounted, he becomes identical with the beast.

METHODIST CONFERENCE

The following is a copy of the communication sent in some days ago to the Methodist Episcopal Conference now in session at Pittsburg, by the Delegate from the South. The letter will explain itself:

To the Bishops and Ministers of the Pittsburg Conference of the M. E. Church:

Rev. and Dear Brethren: I have received two extracts from your journals of the 4th and 5th inst. From these extracts I learn you declare receiving the in my proper character as the accredited delegate of the M. E. Church, South, and only invite me to a seat within the bar, as far as in me an element of my private and personal merits. These considerations I shall appreciate, and will reciprocate them with you in all the private walks of Christian and social life; but within the bar of the General Conference I can only be known in my official character.

You will therefore regard this communication as final, on the part of the M. E. Church, South. She can never renew the offer of fraternal relations between the two great bodies of Wesleyan Methodists in the United States. The proposition can be renewed at any time, either now or hereafter, by the M. E. Church. And if ever made upon the basis of the Plan of Separation, as adopted by the Conference of 1844, the Church South will cordially entertain the proposition.

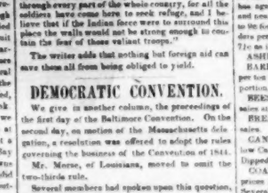
With sentiments of deep regard, and with feelings of disappointed hope, I am yours, in Christian fellowship, L. PIERCE,

Delegate from the M. E. Church, South.

Pittsburg, May 8, 1848.

No further action was taken on this letter, save the passage of a resolution granting to the Doctor a copy of his former communication, as requested by him.

LATEST NEWS!



FROM MEXICO.

IMPORTANT FROM YUCATAN.

La Patria of the 12th, has letters from Campeachy to the 29th ultimo. The Tribune translates as follows:

"We are going on badly here, very badly; in spite of the treaty celebrated between Governor Barbachano and the Indian Pat, the Indians have entered the territory of this Province, and have seized Sturbide and Cibalchen, distant towns, 20 leagues from this city—which were deserted in their entire extent, on the approach of the Indians, to defend them. In fact, the Indians can now go through every part of the whole country, for all the inhabitants have been to seek refuge, and I believe that if the Indian force were to surround this place the walls would not be strong enough to contain the fear of these valiant troops."

The writer adds that nothing but foreign aid can save them all from being obliged to yield.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

We give in another column, the proceedings of the first day of the Baltimore Convention. On the second day, on motion of the Massachusetts delegation, a resolution was offered to adopt the rules governing the business of the Convention of 1844.

Mr. Morse, of Louisiana, moved to omit the two-thirds rule.

United States SATURDAY POST.

Philadelphia:
SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1848.

THE SUMMER CAMPAIGN.

A STORY

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

Determined to leave nothing undone to maintain for the MAMMOTH POST the reputation it has acquired of being the "Best Weekly Paper in America," we have the pleasure of announcing to our vast and rapidly increasing family of readers, that we shall open the Summer Campaign, with the publication of a new story from the pen of that powerful and thrilling American writer, Mrs. ANN S. STEPHENS.

We shall commence the publication of Mrs. Stephens's story in the early part of June next.

It is hardly necessary to add that those who have it in contemplation to subscribe to the Post during the coming season, will find it much to their advantage to send on their names by the first of our work, in time for the opening of Mrs. Stephens's story. We shall print a large number of extra copies, but, judging of the future by the past, it will be hardly possible to supply the great demand for back numbers. The best plan for those intending to subscribe, is to send on their names as soon as possible—as they not only thus render a favor upon us, by letting us know to what extent to increase our edition, but have the satisfaction of receiving their papers fresh in all their departments.

General News.

THE DONATION LANDS OF ARKANSAS.

Senator Borland publishes in the Washington Union, of the 17th, a letter in answer to the many inquiries made of him respecting the lands which the State of Arkansas proposes to give away to actual settlers. As this information concerns a large class of our population, we publish the mode by which the lands can be obtained.

The title which the State has in the lands she offers to donate, is acquired by the statutes enacted at various times, which provide, in substance, that all lands which have been, and all which at any future period may be, once advertised and offered for sale by the Auditor, for the non-payment of taxes, and shall not be re-advertised or offered at public sale; but the Auditor is empowered to dispose of them to purchasers, or to actual settlers, agreeably to existing laws, which in substance provide that the title of these lands may be acquired in the following manner:—

By Purchase.—Any person, resident of this State, or a non-resident, by application to the Auditor, personally or through an agent, may purchase from the State any number of tracts which have been forfeited as above stated, on payment of the arrearages of taxes and costs due, and the Auditor's fee for drawing the deed. This amount of taxes and costs due, vary, of course, according to the number of years for which the taxes remain unpaid; but the average cost of purchasing a tract of one hundred and sixty acres may be set down at about fifteen dollars. When thus paid for, the purchaser is not required to make any improvement. All the title of the State to the tract or tracts purchased passes immediately, divested of all contingencies, to the grantee, by a deed which the laws declare shall vest in him, his heirs or assigns, a good and valid title, both in law and equity, and shall be received in all courts of the State as evidence of a good and valid title in such grantee, his heirs and assigns, and shall be evidence that all things required by law to be done, to make a good and valid sale, were done both by the Collector and the Auditor.

By Donation.—Donations of these lands are limited to one hundred and sixty acres to any one person. Any person wishing to obtain a donation of any tract or tracts, which together do not exceed in quantity one hundred and sixty acres, may apply personally, or by agent, to the Auditor, designating the particular tract or tracts for which a title is desired, who, upon the payment of his fee of one dollar and twenty-five cents for drawing the deed, will execute a conveyance of the right of the State to the tract or tracts described, which title is rendered indefeasible in the donee, by a compliance with the requisitions of the law, which in substance are as follows: The donee to file in the office of the Auditor, within eighteen months from the date of his deed, the certificate of a justice of the peace, or constable of the township in which the land is situated, setting forth that five acres of the land donated to him have been cleared, fenced, and placed in readiness for cultivation. When this certificate has been filed, the deed vests in the donee a title of the same force and effect as that acquired by purchase, as mentioned above.

It is estimated that, at the present time, Arkansas holds about half a million acres of land, subject to be disposed of as stated above. These lands are situated in almost every portion of the State, embracing river bottoms, prairie, plain, and upland, of every grade, so that purchasers or donees, can make such locations as their interest or fancy may prompt them to select.

Many of these lands are already in process of rapid transition from their late wild state to profitable cultivation, and pleasant homes. This invitation is given to all classes of people of all countries.

A PIOUS COUNTERFEITER.

A Dr. Salisbury is now on trial at Rochester, New York charged with the manufacture of bogus coin. The Doctor is a man of wealth, has occupied a prominent position in society, was a leading member of one of the churches, and yet it was given in evidence that after having spent the night, of a Saturday, for instance, in the manufacture of counterfeit coin, he would go into the Sunday school the next morning, and take a leading part in the exercises! He was a prominent mover in all the philanthropic projects of the day, remarkable for propriety, soberness and benevolence! This was his general character in the community, and yet from the testimony on the part of the prosecution, he is connected with a band of the most deliberate scoundrels that ever went unwhipped of justice!

It seems that he had constructed a room (as feet by twelve, and seven feet high, in the rear of his barn, on a side hill, dug out of the ground, which was covered over by plank, and on the top of this was placed a box-house, so as effectually to prevent discovery. The door leading to it was concealed, so as that any one entering the barn a thousand times would not have observed it. The manufacturers generally worked at night, and just previous to the doctor's arrest, a man residing on the adjoining lot, discovered a light peering through the cracks, and on looking through, discovered Salisbury and another counting over what resembled money, and heard the doctor say that if the other had a certain pile he must pay part down or give security.

When preparing his press, &c., for operations, it seems that the doctor represented that he was getting a root mill made for grinding such roots used or his practice as were too bad to pound! The testimony on the part of the prosecution has been closed. In Chautauque county, where the defendant is well known, an intense interest is felt in the result. From present indications, the trial must result in a conviction.

COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS.

The Stock Market has improved under the Caledonia's news. Cotton has gone up in the Liverpool Market. There was a greatly increased business in it, at an advance of ½d to ¾d. per pound.—This, though apparently a small advance, makes an enormous aggregate when counted on the entire crop, and will probably soon tell in a reduced rate of exchange. There was a good prospect for British crops, and American flour and grain had slightly receded in price—wheat 3d. to 3d. per 70 lbs., and flour and corn meal 6d. per bbl. Bacon was in fair request, though hams were dull. Lard, in spite of the unprecedented amount in the Liverpool Market, had all been taken at an advance of 1s. 6d. per cwt. The iron trade was still depressed; business dull, and prices ruling very low.—There were symptoms of improvement in the trade of Manchester.—that is, there was more market, though yarns and goods did not command more money. The sugar market has become more active, and prices are on the advance both in the London and Liverpool Markets; still, the rates now current are, on the average, 1½ per cwt. lower than in the past year, while the stock is only 6,000 tons larger. The English money market has improved, greater confidence prevails, and the leading securities in market are enhanced in price.

SINGING STATISTICS.

We can conceive no more agreeable manner of making a fortune than by singing; there is no little labor and capital to be employed in the operation. We learn from the Albany Express, that in 31 years, Christy's Minstrels have given 8,79 concerts, and with the following result:

Total Receipts,	$55,140 25
" Expenditures,	20,307 26
Net Profits,	$34,832 99

In the year 1843, the entire profits of the Band were $700; but the last year the profits were more than $40,000! This is singing to some purpose. Mr. C.'s receipts for the last seven months, at the Mechanics' Hall, amounted the THOUSAND DOLLARS per week!—N. Y. Paper.

BOILS DISTRIBUTED IN ALABAMA.—An agent for the American Bible Society reports, that out of one thousand families visited, consecutively in Alabama, he found four hundred families destitute of the Bible.

ABSURDITY OF THE LAW.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

NO. 1.

I propose to give you a few desultory numbers on the subject of the absurdity of the law as it is practised and administered throughout the United States. I shall not descend and examine the minute defects of the legal edifice, but content myself with pointing out some of its most prominent imperfections.

In the first place let us consider some points in the law of evidence.

The object of every good system of law ought undoubtedly to be to ascertain the truth of facts, in order that the will of the legislator, made manifest by the law, should be applied, and justice administered; with that intention perhaps, the law has laid a variety of checks to prevent the substitution of truth for falsehood, of exhibiting a taper and passing it for the light of the sun. The rule is that all human testimony must be given under the sanction of an oath, and the witness must not be disqualified either on the ground of interest, or on account of his want of religious principles, or his infamy; or because he is incompetent on the ground of public policy; or by reason of his want of understanding.

The list of exceptions is evidently too long, as will be shown, but the rules applied to each are sometimes perfectly absurd.

The law will not open its eyes, it sees nothing unless in the blaze of noon-day, or what it deems such; rather than walk in a moderate light and act accordingly, it declares nothing is visible, unless made so by the glare of light. It will not receive any evidence, except under oath, nor will it receive it where the chance of its being the mirror of truth are as one hundred thousand to one. A man who has the least interest, say of six cents, in the matter in question, cannot be a witness, and yet his probity is known to be such that no interest whatever would induce him to deviate from the path of rectitude. But a man of the most doubtful character, unless convicted of an infamous crime, may be witness where he is swearing a large fortune into his own pocket, as in the following case: In a suit between Peter, plaintiff, and David, defendant where the whole fortune of the defendant is at stake, the only son of David will be admitted as a witness for his father, and by his testimony will defeat the claim of Peter, and his father will keep a fortune which may the next day, and undoubtedly will, at some future time, (the son at least thinks so,) belong to the witness whose testimony saved it. Who will dare to deny the wisdom of the common law?

But how is the interest of the witness to be ascertained? There are two ways—by the testimony of other witnesses, or by the examination of the witness himself. We cannot but admire the wisdom of the law in relation to this subject. The proposed witness is sworn that he will make true answers as to his interest in the matter in controversy, and he is asked gravely by the person who objects to his examination generally, but who makes him his own witness, and by that very act gives him a credit, he is asked if he has any interest in the matter in controversy. If he has, and he tells the truth, then he is by law declared to be an incompetent witness, and he cannot be examined. If, on the contrary, he swears that he has no interest in it, he will be admitted, although the party opposing his examination may have a witness in court to prove that he has an interest.—

A WOMAN'S OWN COMPANY.—A great fire lately occurred at Chelsea, a town opposite Boston, consuming the factory of a great Washerwoman Company, and large numbers of shirts ready for the tub, and also large numbers done up and ready for delivery. Among those consumed were the linen of the officers of two ships of war now in Boston Harbor, of the steamship Britannia, and of the "regular customers of the establishment," all worth about $10,000. This is a hard case for the sufferers, who will have "no clean clothes for Sunday and next week." They must turn their shirts till "the new ones come home."

"MONEY MAKES THE MARE GO."—There is a singular lawsuit pending in Natchez, Miss., for the ownership of a mare. It appears that two persons lost a mare each about the same time. Some time afterwards one mare was found, which both parties claimed, both being willing to sustain each of their claims by their oaths. In addition to this, each party can bring forward at least thirty witnesses to prove their respective ownership. Costs to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars have already accrued, so that this case reverses the old saying at the head of this article, for the mare makes the money go.

A BIRD DAY.—The day on which the next Presidential election will take place, the 7th of November, will be a busy one. Two millions of votes will be cast throughout the country for the office of President and their suffrages for a President and their suffrages for a President and their suffrages for a Selected Poetry.

SPIRITUAL BEAUTY.

That pale and shadowy beauty,
It seemed my vision now;
The gentle twilight
Of the darling youthful brow;
The high and velvet forehead,
The sweet and child-like look,
The trembling eyelash, which sought
More than mortal earth could,
They came on when the night-winds sighed,
And daylight-dreams broke their spell

I see the blue eye closing
Through the lashes in their fall,
An friend grey speaking
To the inward life of all—
A my that was illumed
At the for celestial light,
And fadeth through mist and shadow,
A beacon ever bright,
Spaces, temples, and solitudes—
And companions with the flight of time.

A faint, unapparent rose-light
Is trembling on the cheek,
And lingering on the pale lip—
A glow that seems to speak.
It waveth like the lique—
Dim in at fresh strife—
When night-winds whisper to it
It breathes of the Divine,
With its ethereal mystery,
Too fragile of the earth to be

Her grace is as a shadow;
An reflectionless—
Wedded to every motion thus,
And rarely beautiful.
Untaught, and all unconscious,
It hath a voice to me
Which eloquently speaketh
Of inward harmony—
Of Soul and Sense together wreathed—
To the First that is offering unto.

That pale and shadowy beauty,
It seemed an inward thing;
A spiritual vision—
A chaste imagining;
Not all in form or feature,
The fairy phantom dwelt,
But like the air of Heaven,
Was yet less earth than felt;
A presence the true heart to move
To praise, and prayer, and holy Love.

E. J. B.

Pictures of Life.

THE DAILY GOVERNESS.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The lark went up to Heaven, seeming to beat his breast against the ancient sky: yet tiny open as he was—scarcely discernible to the keenest vision, his song was audible to Lucy Hinchliff in his mother's little garden. Lucy was a daily governess, and was in the act of plucking a rose to adorn her bosom, before she set out to enter upon the day's routine. She cast her eyes around the modest garden—it was a very modest, very little garden—looked up at the lark once more, received the last note of its song into her soul, smiled at the grey-haired mother in the pinched widow's cap, who was standing at the window, waved her adieu, and closed the small gate after her.

There was not in all the suburb in which we lived a better girl, a prettier girl, a more loving more dutiful daughter than Lucy Hinchliff. Be first attracted our attention when we went, with mother, on our back, willingly enough, to school. She was younger by two years than ourselves—little, timid thing, as we remember. She had a father at that time, but we could see that the gentleman was poor; and once we were prompted to offer (or some of our victuals which we have in our bag (for we dined at school) fearing that she had not enough to eat at home. It was only a boy's thought, and we are sure more happy that we did not commit ourselves by the insult, than if we had resisted our early dreams, these bubbles bred in a child's native brain.

Her father died, and they became poorer. A rich relation took Lucy away, to bestow upon her a superior education. It was all he could do for her, he said; though he kept his carriage, and his servants, and cast bread to dogs. She returned to her mother after three years, to aid their mutual support by teaching.

Who knows, besides themselves, the lives the daily governess lead? Who has tasted, besides themselves, the bitterness of the bread they eat? The fine mistress may not frown too severely upon her cook or footman. They would resent it, and would seek another place. But the poor governess? Not so well resign her engagement is not to be apprehended. And are there not dozens—scores, who would be glad to succeed her, if she gave herself airs? There are tragedies in real life more sad to witness than any of the histrionic art, and the life of the daily governess, in meagre circumstances, is one whole tragedy.

Lucy Hinchliff closed the garden gate, and passed from her mother's sight. It was a fine morning, and she was early. She had, therefore, no occasion to hurry, as she was sometimes obliged to do. She felt very glad that the morning was fine, for to tell a homely truth, her shoes—well, high worn out—were far from being water-proof. She had at all day with wet feet once before, from the same cause, and much need she had to be careful of her health for her mother's sake. She had a few acquaintances on the road she traversed—though she was familiar as their own children's faces to all the small tradesmen—they saw her pass so regularly morning and evening. The green-grocer would frequently tell her what that it was time to get the breakfast, for the young lady with the moist-paper was abroad. The toll-gate keeper was Lucy's only speaking acquaintance of the male sex. He had always a kind word for her. Now did Lucy talk to such him after the child that was scalded—a frightful accident that—on whether his eldest girl was at home yet, and other little quarter. "There she goes," the man would say, when she had turned from him. "Her's a hard life, poor thing!"

"Not hard, at all, Mister Marten," retorted Dame Wrangham, on one occasion. "Hard, indeed. I think she's got a very easy berth o't. Put her over a washing tub, and give her three or four countenances for a morning's work, and see what she'd make of it."

"Ah, you don't know all!" said the toll-keeper, significantly. And he was right.

The lady at whose house Lucy commenced the instructions of the day, was a very nervous lady indeed; and like your nervous people she was extremely irascible. Lucy's knock offended her. She hated single knocks. Why had they a bell if it was not to exempt the house from the vulgarity of single knocks? Once, in a fit of forgetfulness, the governess gave a palpitating double knock, and then Mrs. Rob. Smith was astonished at her presumption. "Mam—Mam—I forget your name." Mrs. Robert Smith often contrived to forget a name which was the property of a humble dependant, and was so much better than her own.

"Hinchliff, ma'am," pronounced Lucy on the occasion referred to.

"Ah, Hinchliff. Well, Miss Hinchliff, if, for the future, you would remember not to give a double knock, you would oblige me. I really thought it was visitors, as I do so I ask to my drawing-room, and all in a flutter—quite upset nervous, Miss Hinchliff."

Poor Lucy! If one could have alluded to her much in fashion as to her to the possession of nerves, the lady's nervousness would have infected her.

"Now, Miss Hinchliff," said Mrs. Robert Smith when the governess had taken off her bonnet and shawl on the morning we make her acquaintance "are you up in your new quadrilles yet?"

"I am very sorry, ma'am, but I have been so much engaged—I only took them home the day before yesterday, and so little of my time is my own."

"Well, Miss Hinchliff, of course, if you have more engagements, and my dear children are to be neglected on that account, it will be Mr. Robert Smith's duty to seek another responsible person, whose engagements are not so numerous; you cannot object to that, I am sure."

"Oh, no, ma'am," she said, faltering reply; "I am too happy to be employed by you. I will be sure to get the quadrilles ready by to-morrow."

Good girl her. She spoke the truth. She was too happy to be employed by Mrs. Robt. Smith.

"I will excuse you that time, Miss Hinchliff," said the lady, consulated by Lucy's answer, "but I shall certainly expect the quadrilles to-morrow. I thought you said when we first engaged you, that you taught Italian? Pucella is to learn it."

"I should be most happy, ma'am!" replied Lucy, brightening up.

"Mr. Robert Smith says that he has read—he is a great reader, as you know—that there are some very pretty poems in Italian, though he called one by a very shocking name—a kind of play-house thing!"

"Which was that, ma'am?" inquired Lucy, mentally reverting to Goldoni and Metastatio.

"You ought to tell me," replied the lady. "You know of course—the pretty Italian poem with the play-house name."

"Do you mean Dante's Divine Comedy, ma'am?"

"Yes, that is it—a very pretty poem—is it not?"

"It is considered a very fine poem, ma'am."

"Yes, pretty or fine—that's what Mr. Robert Smith called it; though I think, if 'tis a comedy, it shouldn't be called Divine."

Lucy assured the lady that the Divine Comedy was not a play in five acts with stage directions, but rather a religious poem.

"I understand your meaning," said her employer, "something like Milton, I suppose. I have heard Mr. Robert Smith remark—his remarks are so to the purpose—that Milton was a tragedy, quite. You will understand that you are to teach Pucella Italian. And about the terms, Mr. Robert Smith says that you are not to interest them, so he really can't afford it."

"Ma'am," said Lucy, astonished.

"If you object, of course, we must find another respectable person, who will include Italian for the subject of your present salary."

Lucy's mother was in failing health. Hard was my that she was "too happy" to teach Italian without remuneration, under the circumstances. On the same morning Mrs. Robert Smith discharged her cook, who blundered at a pate de foie gras, and hired another at greatly enlarged wages.

The Widow Hinchliff was not only in failing health, but she was nearer death than Lucy had any idea of. When the poor girl returned home that evening—the want to ask home first, and walked a distance of seventeen miles—she found that her parent had been obliged to retire to bed. The servant, alarmed by her mistress's condition, had called in a neighbor, who only waited for Lucy's return to urge the propriety of sending for a doctor. Lucy not only assented, but ran herself to fetch one. "I can give you no hope," he said; and she felt that a blight had indeed passed over her young life. When one that we dearly love is stricken down to die, we look out upon the world as if we had no longer hope, or part, or any lot, therein.

She had to practice the quadrilles that night, on her hired piano, in fulfillment of the promise made to Mrs. Robert Smith. Her mother had fallen into one of those dozing, restless slumbers, peculiar to a state of sickness, and the thought of waking the notes of gay quadrille music in the house on whose threshold, even at that moment, Death, the destroyer, stood, shocked Lucy's feelings. No, she could not do that, let Mrs. Robert Smith say what she pleased.

She sat through the longest night she had ever known—for the heart measures the hours—not the clock—a watcher by her mother's bed. When the glad sunlight came gushing in at the casement, her lark after lark poured fourth his jubilant thanksgiving for his sleep in the dewy grass, she understood herself, and went to her own chamber, leaving the servant to supply her place. There was no visible alteration in her parent, when, with many tears and with one of the saddest hearts that ever beat in human bosom, she left the cottage upon her constant, diurnal mission. She was late, and had to walk hurriedly. It rained, too, and the water soaked through the leaky shoes. She had no smile for the toll-gate-keeper. He saw that she was sad, and contented himself with a touch of his hat, by the way of recognition. He was sad, too, for the scalded child had died during the night. "Best not to tell her now," he thought; "she has her own trouble this morning." God help her, she had indeed.

"You are full two minutes behind your time, Miss Hinchliff. I never feel you staying two minutes over your time," was Mrs. Robert Smith's salutation.

"I am very sorry, ma'am—but I left my mother at home very ill—dying, ma'am, the doctor says," replied Lucy, bursting into tears.

"Dying—dear me. Of course you feel very much put out; but gentility, Mr. Robert Smith says, is the soul of an engagement—and you have a character to keep up—but as you are come, you can set Priscilla's mind at ease; she is dying to play the quadrilles, and to begin her Italian."

"I—I was unable to run them through last night, ma'am," stammered Lucy, "my mother was so ill."

"Then you are not ready with those quadrilles again, Miss Hinchliff," exclaimed Mrs. Robert Smith; "really, at your age, a young woman should know the value of her promise."

"I could not disturb my mother," said Lucy appealingly.

"Of course, I take all that into consideration," replied her employer. "But you, as a responsible person, should know the value of a promise. However, I will excuse you, since your mother is dying—only don't let it happen again. You will commence Priscilla's Italian this morning, of course?"

"I have been so unfortunate as to forget my own grammar, but if Priscilla is provided with one—"

"Her father says that he cannot afford an Italian books—her French ones came so expensive he thought you could have no objection to lender your's."

"What could Lucy say, but that her books were at Priscilla's service?

Her mother was worse that evening, and her room, on the neighbor said, delirious during her absence. Lucy asked herself whether she should practice the quadrilles. She was not long in deciding. Though they should go without bread, she would not forget her duty as a daughter. He place was at her mother's bedside.

That day Mr. Robert Smith paid a visit to a friend, whose governess not only taught Italian for the same salary that was paid to Lucy Hinchliff, but also professed to include Spanish. When Lucy was admitted the next morning, the lady placed a small sum of money in her hand, and informed her that "disagreeable arrangements" would render her attendance in future unnecessary. The poor girl was not at all cast down by this circumstance. Was not her mother ill—dying, at home? She could not be obliged to leave her so early in the morning.

Her mother died three days afterwards. A letter sent by Lucy to the rich relation, brought a cool answer back, in which the writer recommended her to be industrious, and to "keep her character."

And now Lucy was alone in the world, in which are so many faces, and so many hearts beating with warm life. Even the toll-gate keeper had disappeared. His place was supplied by a stranger, a man of coarse, repulsive aspect. Lucy felt the loss sore and sad acquaintance.

Within a month after her mother's death, she was compelled to resign another of her engagements; her employer, a widow, having made disinsinuable proposals to her. She advertised in the papers, but could not meet with an appointment. She had removed into lodgings now.

One night—it was a cold rainy November night—Lucy Hinchliff sat in her little room by her fire, wondering much over many things, but chiefly that it was fitting for a young girl like her to be so long unpretested, was exposed to so many insults. She gazed at her mother's portrait which young over the mantel shelf, and seemed to ask of her of the deed. But the deed replied not. Only the bleak wind whistled. Only the rain beat against the window panes.

There was a stir below, as of feet coming up stairs. Lucy heard it without heed. The feet came higher and higher, however, and halted at her door; upon the panels of which a rap sounded from knuckles, timid, sturdy knuckles. The governess started, and cried, "Come in," and a man came in.

It was her old acquaintance, the toll-keeper.

But not dressed as he was formerly. No. He wore a tram new suit of superfine Sammy cloth, and a gold watch-guard communicated with his vest pocket. As far as equipment went, he was in all respects the gentleman. And in the heart he also.

"I beg your pardon, Miss, for intruding upon you," he said, hesitatingly. "I am come to speak to you about educating my children."

Lucy bowed. She thought she had misunderstood him.

"I am come into a large fortune lately, Miss—very large fortune—a matter of a thousand a-year, know no more of it, three months ago, bless you, than the man in the moon; and I think, and more than that, that our girls ought to be educated."

"Certainly," said Lucy, vacantly. She thought she was dreaming.

"And we are agreed that if you would come as one with us—we live in a fine house now—and let one of ourselves, and teach the children, we thought we should take it very kind of you."

"Yes," assented Lucy, mechanically, for at the end of all the money making.

"And if you would think two hundred pounds a-year, and a room of your own, enough, it comes to morrow; and that's all about it."

The speaker, in the excitement of having arrived at his second fortune, clapped his hat on his head, as a mark of emphasis. But he recollected himself, and took his hat off again.

"You wish me to be governess to your children? I understand you aright?" said Lucy, only half understanding that the scene was real.

"Yes, Miss, if you please; and if two hundred a-year would satisfy you, why—why its done, and that's just where it is."

"I think God," cried Lucy, bursting into tears for the wife awake, and understood all now.

It was a happy home, the home to which the man had really inherited a large fortune, left him by some relative, hitherto unheard of. And what his early thought about the poor governess who gave him a good word every morning, and inquired after Billy, who was scalded? Yes; he had heard of her mother's death, and the prompt consciousness of being able to render a benefit to an orphan girl, elated his heart as much as the possession of a thousand pounds per annum. Lucy, of course, would not consent to receive the salary he had named. How it was finally settled, the chronicler knows not; but Lucy dwells with the quondam toll-keeper, and looks happy—very happy.

A small white stone has been erected at her mother's grave. You may see it, if you will walk for the purpose, to Abney Park Cemetery, Stoke Newington.

TIGHT LACING.

Physicians are writing volumes on the evils of tight lacing, and publishing diagrams to show how the human family may be screwed up, to the utmost danger of lungs and respiration. But we have a more practical development of the evil in the long life of a female who abhorred tight lacing Mrs. Charity Berry, of New Jersey, who died lately at the age of one hundred and ten years, always abhorred tight lacing. She had thirteen children, all of whom put live, and she was remarkable for her opposition to their practice. Fashion bills more of her votaries, than cold climate or damp locations, than the Torrid Zone or even Pandora's Box. From the year 1700 to 1800, tight lacing was entirely abandoned; but it came again, and has since been gradually increasing until consumption has become a kind of epidemic. Those ladies who are ambitious to live until the age of one hundred and ten, like Mrs. Berry, should cut away the easy lace, breathe free, and about Vase to Lalaste!—Morning Star.

Story of Leap Year.

THE GIRL WHO WOULD BE MARRIED.

Mamma, Edmon—I was much pleased with the domestic sketch of "Turning Over a New Leaf," in a January number. If yet think the following story worthy of being a sequel to it, please publish it. It is a true tale, and happened in the neighborhood in which I was born. I have heard my mother relate the circumstances many a time and oft—and I personally knew the hardly well!

Mr. W——, had by industry and economy accumulated a large property. He was a man of rather superior mind and acquirements, but unfortunately became addicted to habits of intemperance. Naturally fond of company, and possessing superior conversational powers, his society was much sought, and he eventually became a notable. His wife was a feeble woman, without much decision of character, but an only child, a daughter, was the reverse, illustrating one of those singular laws of nature, that the feminine offspring take after the father in character and personal peculiarities, and the males after the mother.

Mary, for so we will call her, was well aware of the consequences that would inevitably follow her father's choice, and had used every exertion of reason and persuasion in her power, to induce him to alter his habits, without avail; his resolutions and promises could not withstand temptation, and he pursued his downward course, till the poor girl despaired of reform, and grievously realized what the end must result in.

John D——, was a young man from the East, possessed of a good education, and all our Yankee blood boys are, and the most indomitable industry and perseverance—was working on the farm of a neighbor by the month.

Mary, on going on some errand to the next house, met him on the road with the usual salutation—

Mary—"Good morning, Mr. D——."

John—"Good morning, Miss W——. How's your health?"

Mary—"Well, I thank you—but, to tell the truth, sick at heart."

John—"Pray, what is the trouble—what can affect a cheerful, lively girl like you, possessing everything to make you happy?"

Mary—"On the contrary everything conspires to make me miserable. I am almost weary of life—what it is a subject I cannot explain to you, and yet I have sometimes thought I might."

John—"Anything that I can do for you, Miss W——, you may freely command."

Mary—"That is promising more than you may be willing to perform; but to break the ice at once, do you want a wife?"

John—"A wife! Well, I don't know—do you want a husband?"

Mary—"Indeed I do, the worst way. I don't wonder at your surprised, I probably signed the order without reading it, and he in his turn summoned the proctor. The proctor could give no explanation, and sent for his deputy, who, after two days of research, at last found the fatal document. It was taken to the Tuileries, and there it was found that it was made out upon the complaint of the cousin one who had actually changed Rosette with having spoken of Bonaparte as a spoliator. "How!—when?—where?" This the denunciation did not mention. The censor was ordered to make his apparentness; but he was absent a hundred leagues off, on a tour of inspection, exercising his vigilant superintendence of the provincial press.

"Let Rosette himself be examined," was Napoleon's next order; "for besides that I believe him incapable of such an act, it really would not be common sense in a Jacobin."

The next day Rosette was once more permitted to see the son, and was carried to the cabinet of the Duke of Otranto, where Fontanes was already in attendance.

"Sir," said Fouche, "you are accused of a libel against the present Prince who reigns over this mighty empire."

"A libel! I, my lord? Surely you cannot believe it? A libel comes from libelles, a little book. Ask that gentleman, sir, at the head of our university. I know too well the meaning, the force of words, too—"

"Nevertheless," added Fontanes, showing him the information, but keeping his finger over the signature—"read this."

Rosette cast his eye rapidly along the paper.

"Well?" cried Fouche, seeing the quiet countenance unchanged.

"Is that all?" said Rosette.

"All! and is it not quite enough? I hope, for your sake, it is a mistake."

"Not at all, it is the truth."

"The truth!"

"Unquestionably; it was all to do honor to our Emperor."

"To do honor to him!"

"Yes; to show that he was as great a linguist as he is a hero."

"Come, sir," said Fouche, impatiently, "it is quite time to put an end to such foolery. This is no jesting matter."

"God forbid that I should make a jest of it; I would not take such a liberty in your excellency's presence."

"Be good enough to give some explanation then."

"Nothing more easy;" and taking a copy of his Dictionary, which lay on the table, he opened it at the word "spoliator," and pointed to two words in the following order:—"Spoliator, Hetrusca."

The two functionaries indignantly exclaimed,—"And what could have tempted you to such an audacious libel?"

"I was but giving his majesty the credit due to him. I put his name after the word "spoliator," as the authority for the word; he, when General Bonaparte, having been the first to make use of the expression in the tribune. It is a coinage of his own, and not known in the French language till he used it."

Fouche and Fontanes turned upon each other a bewildered look. Rosette was set at liberty; but it cost him the expense of the sheets that replaced the seditious page through the whole edition. And Rosette thought himself happy to get off so cheaply, now that he began to perceive that his tribute to the Emperor's coinage was considered so equivocal a compliment.

THE DOOM FORETOLD.

FROM THE PARIS CORRESPONDENCE OF THE LONDON ATLAS.

You would be much amused by the various gossiping stories which are afloat in the salons of Paris at this moment. They remind me of all the wild rumors which were current just at the period of the first Revolution, and which have been handed down to us with such fearful exactness by the memoirs of the time. Among others I may quote one which I heard last night from the lips of a gentleman who described himself as an eye-witness of the whole scene, and whose character for truth is unimpeachable. The adventure happened last Summer, while the whole of the ex-royal family were gathered together at Neuilly. The person who told me the story had been invited to dinner by Louis Philippe, along with Dr. B., who had been summoned to wait upon the young Duke Philippe of Wurtemburg, who had been menaced with an attack of the croup, to which he has been from his birth alarmingly subject.

The doctor hour was an early one, according to the laissez aller habits of the royal family when at Neuilly, and, after the repast, the whole company, instead of adjourning to the drawing-room, strolled out upon the grass plot before the entrance to enjoy the beauty of the evening, and the coolness of the setting sun after the burning heat of the day. Doctor B., in addition to his great skill in the management of children, is one of the first magnetisers in Paris; and the conversation, as is usual when the latter has in present, turned upon magnetism. He told many wonderful tales of course, concerning the clairvoyance of some of his patients, and their extraordinary power in foretelling the future of others, until, being pressed by the King, he looked around to see if any among the company here cottage of a very great susceptibility to magnetic influence. He hesitated, when the King bade him name the person who would be most likely to be clairvoyant in the company.

"There is a person present," returned the doctor, "who possesses, in a most extraordinary degree, every symptom of the peculiar facility—Madame La Princesse de Joinville would, I am sure, astonish us, would she but submit to trial."

Curiosity had been much excited by the various wonderful tales of the magnetiser, and the whole of the youthful portion of the royal family united in supplication to the Princess to allow him to try his skill. After some little reluctance, connected, I believe, with religious scruples, the fair Princess consented to the experiment. "She was seated," said my informant, "on a raised mound of grass, formed around the base of a wide-spreading oak; she had thrown over her head the scarf of dark blue crape which she had worn upon her neck, and as she leaned against the tree, her pale thin features and shadowy form made her look dreamy and spiritual, a being just fitted to hold communion with another world. In a moment, and, I believe, with no other ceremony than the placing of his thumb against hers, did she realize the doctor's prediction, and fall into as deep a magnetic slumber as it was possible to witness. There was a deep silence among the persons gathered there, and the doctor having addressed a few questions to her, turned to demand which member of the family would like to consult her in the name of the rest. Madame Adelaide it was who volunteered, and to her questioning did the patient reply with such truth concerning the past, that she felt emboldened to consult her with regard to the future. I give you my honor as a gentleman," added my informant, "that in that trance every event which has happened with such fearful rapidity to astonish and confound us all was foretold with most awful precision. The day, the hour of the fight was named, as well as the despatchment of the Tuileries—the carrying of the diamonds once belonging to the crown of the Emperor by a person about the Court, (they have not been found,) and a second outbreaking, but the disaster, and which concerns the Orleans family alone. 'You name me' said," said Madame Adelaide. 'With whom can I to fly?' 'You will remain calmly and peacefully in France,' replied the somnambulist, at which observation the King laughed, and said that this last prophecy was sufficient to betray the fallacy of the whole, as his alone would be incapable of enduring them in the hour of peril." I have heard this story from two or three individuals, and from one who declares himself to have been an eye-witness to the scene, and have no reason to doubt its accuracy.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

At a recent anniversary of the American Society for ameliorating the condition of the Jews, celebrated in the city of New York, the Rev. Dr. Tyng recited a remarkable poem of Charlotte Elizabeth, with the foregoing title. The Reverend Doctor offered a resolution "that the signs of the times are such as should arouse all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and wait for His salvation, to renewed and enlarged effort in this holy enterprise"—and established a frequent speech upon the subject by the remark that this poem embodied the whole of all he had further to say.—The Scriptural references were arranged by Dr. Tyng:—

When from scattered lands afar	Matt. 24 : 6, 8
Spreads the voice of rumored war	Luke 21 : 25
Nations in tumultuous pride	Haggai 2 : 7
Heaved like ocean's roaring tide	Hebrews 12 : 26, 29
When the solar splendors fail	Matt. 24 : 29
When the crescent wanneth pale	Rev. 16 : 12
And the powers that shaklen reign	Matt. 24 : 29
Sink dishonored to the plain	Joel 11 : 26, 31
World! do thou the signal dread	Luke 21 : 26, 33
We await the dropping head	Luke 22 : 27, 30
We uplift the expectant eye	Eph 1 : 14
Our redemption drawest nigh	Rom 8 : 9, 23
When the fig-tree shoots appear	Matt. 24 : 32, 33
Man behold their summer near	Luke 21 : 29, 31
When the hearts of rebels fail	Isaiah 59 : 18, 19
We the coming conqueror hail	Rev. 19 : 11, 16
Bridegroom of the weeping spouse	Rev. 19 : 7, 9
Listen to our longing vows	Rev. 6 : 10
Listen to her widowed moan	Luke 18 : 3, 7, 8
Listen to Creation's groan	Rom. 8 : 22, 23
Rod, oh, bid Thy trumpet sound	1 Thess. 4 : 16
Gather Thine elect around	Matt. 24 : 31
Gird with saints Thy flaming car	Jude 14
Summon them from clime afar	Isaiah 24 : 13, 15
Call them from life's cheerless gloom	Matt. 24 : 40, 41
Call them from the marble tomb	Rev. 20 : 4, 6
From the grass-grown village grave	Luke 14 : 14
From the deep-dissolving wave	Psalm 69 : 14, 15
From the whirlwind and the flame	1 Thess. 4 : 17
Mighty Head, thy members claim	Col 1 : 15
Where are they whose proud dominion	Luke 19 : 12, 27
Scorned to brook Messiah's reign?	Matt. 16 : 41, 42
Lo, in waves of ralph'ous fire	Luke 17 : 27, 30
How they taste His tardy ire	Rev. 19 : 20, 21
Fettered till the appointed day	Rev. 20 : 2, 3
When the world shall pass away	2 Peter : 2, 9
Quelled are all Thy foes, oh Lord	Rev. 19 : 15, 21
Satanic again the dreadful sword	Psalm 110 : 5, 7
Where the Cross of anguish stood	Isaiah 53 : 3, 5, 12
Where Thy life distilled its blood	Mark 15 : 27
Where they mocked Thy dying groan	Mark 19 : 29
King of Nations! pleat Thy throne	Isaiah 24 : 23
Send Thy law from Zion forth	Zach 8 : 3
Speeding o'er the willing earth	Daniel 2 : 32-44
Earth, whose Sabbath glorious rise	Isaiah 60 : 1, 3
Crowned with more than Paradise	Psalm 67 : 7
Sacred be the impending veil!	1 Corin. 13 : 12
Mortal sense and thought must fail	1 John 3 : 2
Yet the awful hour is nigh	Luke 21 : 31
We shall see Thine eye to eye	Rev 1 : 7
Be our souls in peace possessed	2 Thess. 3, 5
While we seek Thy promised rest	Heb. 4 : 9
And from every heart and home	2 Tim. 4, 8
Breathe the prayer "Oh, Jesus come!"	Rev. 22, 20
Haste to set the captive free	Isaiah 49 : 9
All Creation groans for Thee	Rom. 8 : 19

The Fashions.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

Very elegant materials are in use for evening dress; brocarts with large patterns in orange color, having by candle-light the effect of gold, others are of black grounds, with wreaths of roses and mixed flowers of showy colors, under satins and gauzes striped in stripes of gold, or silk spangled, &c. Sky blue and violet are the prevailing colors, pale blue for young ladies, and deep violet for the more advanced, which latter color is also much used for high dresses and mantelets and pelerines, harmonizing in color with these dresses. Dentelles; black lace is well suited; foulards and barages again constitute the most elegant negligees; we have also tulles de lain glaces and embroidered, new papelines and checked taffetas, the last are in small checks, in which white prevails, and are adopted for young ladies. Many of the spring redingotes are ornamented with buttons, others with biais, edged with frenge or deep flounces festonnes, pinked or simply hemmed; corsages less high will be fashionable, but will still have to contend with the puritan form; two styles of low bodices are spoken of, those a la Grecque, with corsages made of lace, are spoken of; there is no particular change of sleeves, for dinner dresses the trimmings are mostly en tablier. In ball dresses the double or triple skirt is always worn.

The mantilles, mantelet, demi-pelisse, little pelerines are all made this season of plain or glace taffetas; the trimmings generally of frills, pinked in two or three rows at the back, two of which continue round the arm, falling as a sleeve on the hand; the third is continued round the ends, which are either round or pointed. The newest style is the mantilles, and is small in form, resembling the mantelet in shape, without the ends; the pardessus Milanais is made of Italian glace, with stripe border of lace. The new bonnets are round in form, and jockey crowns continue in favor. Some bonnets are of a more open form, and these require more ornament inside. Some are made entirely of ribbon, others of rubbair and straw, and of gimp straw, lace and straw; but the Parisian lady has a preference to Leghorns, for which they reserve their ostrich, marabout and heron feathers. A new tuse de paille is made in bands, which, sewed together, forms a pretty bonnet de fantaisie. The rapate cantilous of pink satin, covered with black lace, forming fichu, on the crown, and violette at the edge, ornamented inside with roses, is very generally admired. Fancy straws are ornamented by wild flowers, foliage, bunches of the peach and the apricot blossoms, &c. Various simple and pretty caps are worn for negligee, all of a new kind of foliage ribbon, which forms so pretty a trimming. The fauchon is also admired, richly embroidered and trimmed with Valenciennes or Mechlin lace.

Small blond caps with flowers, and dress hats with feathers, are reserved for evening wear; sounds of velours epingle are worn in the hair, and many pretty coiffures are made of bugles in every color. Bracelets are universally in favor, large or small, rich or simple, in every variety of material one or more clasps, the bracelet is worn suspended from the waist, also various in value. The gloves continue short, ornamented at the top by ribbon, corsades beads or narrow blond forming ruches.—From the London and Paris Ladies' Magazine of Fashion.

For Housekeepers.

OLD SCRAPS FOR YOUNG HOUSEKEEPERS.

SELECTED FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING CAKE.

Do not use the hand to make cake, but a wooden spoon or spad. Eathen is best to make cake in.

In receipts where milk is used, never mix sweet and sour milk, as it makes cake heavy, even when either alone would not do it. Butter is the best shortening, sperm cake.

Try whether cake is done by piercing it with a brown splinter, and if nothing adheres it is done.

An oven, to bake cake well, must have a good heat at the bottom, and not be too hot on the top, or the cake will be burnt.

Cake that is to be frosted, should be baked in pans with perpendicular instead of slanting sides. Line them with buttered paper, the salt soaked out of the butter. If the oven proves too hot, cover the top with paper before it hardens, or the cake will be heavy.

The best way to put in fruit is to sprinkle flour over it, then put in a layer of cake at the bottom, half an inch thick, then a layer of fruit, taking care that it does not touch the sides of the pan, and then dry up; then a little more cake, then another layer of fruit, and then till the cake is three inches thick (not more,) and let the top layer be cake.

Always dissolve saleratus, or sal volatile in hot water, as milk does not perfectly dissolve it, and then there will be yellow specks made.

CHILD'S FEATHER CAKE.

Three cups of light dough. Two cups rolled sugar. Three well-beaten eggs, mixed with the sugar and butter. Half a cup of warm milk, or a little less. One teaspoonful of saleratus in two great spoonfuls of water, and put in the milk. One cup of melted butter, worked into the sugar. The grated rind and juice of one lemon. Work all together, adding the lemon-juice just before putting it in buttered pans. If you have no lemons, use one a strong and a teaspoonful of sharp vinegar, added just before putting it in pans. One ounce-half, if the vinegar is weak. Some think this improved by standing to rise fifteen minutes—try it.

GINGER SNAPS.

One cup of molasses. Half a cup of sugar. Half a cup of butter. Half a cup of warm water—the butter melted with it. A small teaspoonful of pearlash, dissolved in the water. Two tablespoonsful of ginger. The dough should be stiff; knead it well, and roll into sheets, cut into round cakes, and bake in a moderate oven.

Agricultural.

AGRICULTURAL ITEMS.

Chlorofoam Applied to a Pig.—We are not sorry to see that this new and wonderful pain deadening agent is likely to come into use for alleviating the sufferings of the inferior animals, in their passage from the midst of life to the salting tub. The Leeds (Eng.) Times informs us that the day before Christmas, Mr. Hector Watson, druggist, of the respectable village of Lowby, near Grimsby, wishing to give "his gentlemen as little uneasiness" as possible en route to the pork barrel, caused our friend the butcher to administer through piggy's mauritous nostrils quantum sufficit of chloroform. "Grunt," naturally fond of sleep, was seen in the land of forgetfulness, when our hero (in the blue frock) very conveniently extracted the requisite portion of vital fluid from the fountain of his existence, leaving the pig, after being scalded, cut up and salted, apparently not a whit wiser for what had passed.—Christian Citizen.

Corn Grown for Fodder.—A farmer in Andover tells us he sows four acres of chess on his grounds to be mown for winter food; he obtains not less than two tons per acre—sows in September. His milch cows do well on it, and eat it readily; it is as bulky as hordgrass. He says it requires annual seeding; in this respect it would not equal our common grasses. We have never tried chess for fodder, and cannot say whether it should be extensively cultivated.—Mass. Ploughman.

Turpentine Trees Dying.—Much concern prevails among the turpentine producers and dealers in all this section of the State, on account of the immense number of pine trees that are dying, without any perceptible cause. One gentleman in Brunswick county has on his plantation one hundred and thirty thousand trees, which have died within a short time. Others, also, we have heard of who have lost from a fourth to a half of their trees. The cause of this extensive destruction of the most valuable trees of our forests is eminently worthy of close investigation.—Wilmington (N. C.) Chronicle.

Peach Trees.—A writer in the Horticulturist thinks that the shortening-in mode of pruning and the use of ashes, will drive that most fatal malady to peach trees—the yellows—out of the country, if cultivators can be brought to estimate their joint value. He uses wood ashes, either leached or unleached—half a peck of the former, or half a bushel of the unleached, for a young tree just beginning to bear. The best time of applying it is in October, but it has been found to answer admirably as late as June. It is best to prune the peach early, but the writer has seen no bad effect from shortening-in as late as the middle of May, and he advises those who have not performed that operation already, to take knife in hand and sally forth immediately.

DIRECTIONS FOR SACKING WOOL.

Wool, intended to be sent to a distant market may be put up and pressed in bales after the manner of cotton, or it may be crowded into sacks holding from 200 to 250 lbs. If designed to be shipped on a long voyage, it would be more economical to press it into square bales, as it would then occupy less hold, and consequently effect a saving of freight. But in the interior of a country, where conveniences for bailing are not always at hand, sacks may be employed, made of 40-inch "burlaps," or 45-inch "gunny cloth," ¾ feet long. Each of these sacks may be made of a piece of cloth 4 yards in length, by doubling the ends until they meet and sewing up the sides with twine.

The mouth of a sack may next be sewed to a strong hoop of wood or iron (diameter 25 inches for the burlaps and 28 inches for the gunny cloth); then let down its body through a circular hole, two feet less in diameter than the hoop, cut in an upper floor of a building, or of a temporary scaffold erected for the purpose, where it can swing clear beneath. One man may then get into the sack, while another hands him the fleeces, which he should place in even layers, pressing them down in the meantime, with his feet, until it is filled. After this, the sack may be slightly raised, the hoop disengaged, the mouth of the sack sewed up with twine, and the operation is complete.—Am. Agriculturist.

The Riddler.

ENIGMA.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

I am composed of 10 letters.
My 3, 1, 6, 10, 14, 11, 5, 5, 18, 7, is a useful article of clothing.
My 2, 12, 13, 3, is much used at night.
My 1o, 5, 3, 7, 10, is much frequented by fowls.
My 13, 8, 1, 9, is a kind of beverage.
My 4, 5, 6, 10, is used by men who shave.
My 14, 15, 16, 8, are sixteen great poets.
My 4, 17, 11, 7, 12, is the name of a calf.
My 11, 10, 18, 7, is used on telescopes.
My whole is another of the Provincial Governments.

P

CHARADE.

My first of polished ivory's precious use,
The fairest work of Nature's hand divine;
My next, or finely decks Sir Fopling Beau,
Or does young Delia's shapely waist confine
My whole nativeness my first, and gives an air
Of elegance and grandeur to the fair

RIDDLE.

Birds, our rare is ancient grown,
Through the British empire known
And what rare of worth is found,
For wisdom and bright are renowned.
Deep though I dwell in sea repose,
Secrets none beside me knows.
I don't the great alone befriend,
Poor men on my aid depend.
Be they to no matter of low
Frequent favors I bestow;
Most sometimes to bettors fall,
The my rank is not all.
One hint, to finish my resource,
My constant care's to keep the crown

ARITHMETICAL QUESTION.

The distance from Edinburgh to London being 400 miles, how long would it take a person to measure it with his feet, supposing his feet to be ten inches long and that he places his foot 50 times in a minute?

CONUNDRUMS.

☞ What is the difference between a good horse now and a bad one?

Ans—A good one guides Miss, and the other Misguides.

☞ What is that which makes everybody sick but those who swallow it?

Ans—Pistoery.

☞ What is that which increases the effect by diminishing the cause?

Ans—A pair of snuffers.

☞ Why is a person reading aloud like a Judge?

Ans—Because he pronounces a sentence.

ANSWERS TO RIDD